IN SENATE,

MONDAY, December 2, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, the Senate was called to order by the Hon. W. R. KING of Ala. president pro tem. when the following Senators appeared in their seats:

MAINE.
Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. RUGGLES.
NEW HAMPSHIRE.
Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. PIERCE.
MASSACHUSETTS.
Mr. DAVIS.
NEW YORK.
Mr. WRIGHT, (One vacancy.)
NEW JERSEY.
Mr. WALL, Mr. SOUTHARD.
PENNSYLVANIA.
Mr. BUCHANAN, (One vacancy.)
DELAWARE.
Mr. CLAYTON, (One vacancy.)
VIRGINAI.
Mr. ROANE, (One vacancy.)
NORTH CAROLINA.
Mr. BROWN. Mr. STRANGE.
SOUTH CAROLINA.
Mr. CALHOUN.
GEORGIA.
Mr. LUMPKIN.
ALABAMA.
Mr. KING, Mr. CLAY.
MISSISSIPPI.
Mr. WALKER.
TENNESSEE.
Mr. WHITE.
KENTUCKY.
Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. CLAY.
OHIO.
Mr. ALLEN.
INDIANA.
Mr. SMITH.
ILLINOIS.
Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. YOUNG.
MISSOURI.
Mr. LINN, Mr. BENTON.
MICHIGAN.
Mr. NORVELL, (One vacancy.)
ARKANSAS.
Mr. FULTON.

Mr. ALLEN presented the credentials of the Hon. BENJAMIN TAPPAN, elected by the Legislature of the State of Ohio a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the credentials of the Hon. ALBERT S. WHITE, elected by the Legislature of the State of Indiana a Senator from that State, to serve for six years, from the 4th of March last.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the credentials of the Hon. THADDEUS BETTS, elected by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the fourth of March last.

The usual oath was then administered by the CHAIR to Messrs. TAPPAN, WHITE, and BETTS, whose credentials were just read; and to Messrs. BENTON, SOUTHARD, and WILLIAMS, whose credentials were presented at the last session.

On motion of Mr. WALKER,

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communications he may make; whereupon,

Messrs. WRIGHT and ALLEN were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. KNIGHT, the usual order for furnishing Senators with newspapers, not to exceed the price of three daily papers, was agreed to.

SMALL NOTES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to bring in a bill providing for the summary collection of the notes of the banks in the District of Columbia, under the denomination of twenty dollars.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Dec. 2, 1839.

This being the day set apart by the Constitution for the assembling of the two Houses of Congress, at 12 o'clock, m. the Clerk (Mr. GARLAND) called the House to order, and said:

According to the usual practice, gentlemen, I am prepared, if it is the pleasure of the House, to proceed to call the names of members of Congress elected to the Twenty-sixth Congress, first session.

The CLERK then called over the names of the following gentlemen, who appeared to be in their seats:

MAINE.
1 District, Nathan Clifford,
2 " Albert Smith,
3 " Benjamin Randall,
4 " George Evans,
5 " Virgil D. Parris,
6 " Hugh J. Anderson,
7 " Joshua A. Lowell,
8 " Thomas Davee.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.
Chosen by General Ticket.
Tristram Shaw,
Ira A. Eastman,
Charles G. Atherton,

31 " Richard P. Marvin,
32 " Mallard Fillmore, 33 " Charles F. Mitchell.

NEW JERSEY.
Joseph F. Randolph,

When the CLERK arrived at this part of the roll, he stated that there was conflicting evidence with regard to the election of five members from this State, and asked if it was the pleasure of the House that he should pass over their names until the call of the balance of the roll was completed.

Mr. MAXWELL wished to know what this evidence was, or whether the usual evidence was produced on both sides.

The CLERK asked if it was the pleasure of the House that he should make a statement as to the usual course of proceeding?

Several members called for the reading of the evidence.

The CLERK then read the commission of Mr. Aycrigg, signed by Governor Pennington, and stated that there were five other commissions in his possession in the same style.

Mr. MERCER then called for the reading of the law of New Jersey on this subject.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON desired that the evidence on the other side be read by the Clerk before the law was read to the House.

Mr. MERCER stated that his object in having the law read at this stage of the proceeding was to show what could be received as evidence by this body.

Mr. VANDERPOEL contended that all the facts should be laid before the House before the law was read. In the present case, there were conflicting returns and conflicting evidence, and it seemed to him that it would be more in order to read the evidence on both sides before the law was read, than to read the law at the present time.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought the most proper course would be for the Clerk to read the law now, so that the House might be enabled to decide what could be received as evidence in relation to this matter. When this body heard the law read, then it could decide whether the paper on the other side could be read as evidence.

Mr. JENIFER wished to know of the Clerk, whether there were any other returns in his possession from New Jersey, signed by the Governor of that State, than the six which had been referred to? If there were not, why not proceed to call the roll in the usual manner?

The CLERK here asked if it was the pleasure of the House that he should make a statement in relation to this matter.

Mr. RIVES respectfully suggested the propriety of laying this motion on the table for the present, in order that the roll might be called through, to ascertain whether there was a quorum of members present. At present nothing could be done. He therefore hoped that the members present would acquiesce in a motion of this kind, in order that the House might immediately proceed with its organization; after which this question could be brought up and acted upon.

Mr. MAXWELL contended that they ought not to adopt this suggestion unless some good reason could be given for passing over the State of New Jersey. There had been sent on to the Clerk certificates in the usual form, which have been read; and it seemed to him that it would be an extraordinary course to pass over the State of New Jersey, after these certificates had been produced.

The CLERK then said that there were three propositions brought to the notice of the body—one to read the law, the other to read the testimony in the possession of the Clerk, and the third to pass over the State of New Jersey until it was ascertained whether there was a quorum in attendance in the House.

Mr. WISE said, that before any motion was put to the body, he wished to know who was to vote on the motion to lay this question on the lable. Had the names of a quorum been called over? If not, who were entitled to vote on this question? If the question was put before the roll was called over, who was entitled to vote? Would the CLERK answer what was the usual course in a case of this kind? Had he (Mr. W.) a right to vote on this question?

The CLERK said it was not for him to decide as to what course the House ought to pursue in relation to this matter.

Mr. WISE. Has any member a right to move to lay this matter on the table?

The CLERK said that would be a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. MERCER thought that the motion of his colleague [Mr. RIVES] would raise the very difficulty which it was the desire of the gentleman to avoid. To avoid difficulty, however, he (Mr. M.) would consent that all the testimony should be read before the law was read; but then he desired to have the law read, in order that gentlemen might see what could be taken as evidence in the present case.

Mr. RIVES did not desire that a vote should be taken upon the question of passing over the State of New Jersey, but hoped that it might be done by the general consent of the members present, in order that the CLERK might go on and ascertain whether there were a quorum of members in attendance. Whan this was done the House could immediately return to this question, and receive evidence on both sides; examine, discuss, and come to correct conclusions upon it. He hoped there would be a general disposition on the part of gentlemen to pursue this course.

Mr. HOFFMAN said the proposition was to call the roll of the House. What roll of the House? Who are the members who are called upon to decide this question? Who but those holding the legal certificates? The Clerk had no right to call his name, unless he produced on his table a legal certificate. The gentlemen from New Jersey, whose names have been called, have produced the legal certificates from the Governor, and are as much entitled to their seats as any member of this House. If there were two sets of certificates from the Governor of New Jersey of equal force and effect, then there might be some reason for passing by that State; but as that was not the case, and as the gentlemen named had laid the only legal evidence of election before the House, it would be incompetent for the body to pass over the State of New Jersey, and proceed in calling the balance of the roll.

Mr. HALSTEAD said he was one of the members from New Jersey, and he demanded, as a Representative of the sovereign State of New Jersey, that his name should be called. The only reason given by the CLERK for not calling his name was, that there was other evidence upon his table, and that there were other persons claiming the seats of the members from New Jersey. He would ask the CLERK, however, whether this other evidence was under the seal of the State of New Jersey, and produced according to the known and established usages of that State, from the formation of its Constitution to the present day. He maintained that he had prima facie evidence that he was entitled to a seat on that floor, because he had a commission from the Governor, under the broad seal of the State, and that the CLERK was bound to call his name. He and his colleagues had their commissions from the Governor of New Jersey, the proper officer to give commissions; and he asked what authority had this House, or any House, to say that those certificates should be disregarded, and that the State of New Jersey should be passed by? There was no authority—there was no power under the Constitution to do so. The Constitution of the United States says that the times, places, and manner of holding elections, shall be prescribed by the Legislature of each State. Then, as this matter had been decided upon by the State authority, it is conclusive, until it is reversed by the decision of the House of Representatives, which is alone, under the Constitution, competent to decide on the qualifications of its members. Then his position was, that until this House was properly organized, and decided upon the question, the commission of the Governor must be taken as prima facie evidence of his right to a seat on that floor. He argued that he was entitled to his seat until a Speaker was chosen, the oaths were administered, and the question was judicially decided upon by the House; and until that was done, the House had no right to make a judicial decision which might forever destroy the sovereignty of the State of New Jersey. For this reason he could not consent to submit this question to the decision of gentlemen here. He could not tell who were entitled to vote upon it, nor could the CLERK undertake to decide who should vote on the question. Was he to vote upon the question, or was he to withdraw? The question, in his opinion, had already been decided by the only competent tribunal, and that decision must stand until reversed by the decision of the House, after it was properly organized.

Mr. H. then read the law of New Jersey on the subject, quoted the case of the Mississippi election, the case of Spalding and Mead, and of Moore and Letcher, in support of the position which he had taken, and argued that the certificate of the Governor, whether given properly or not, was conclusive evidence of his right to a seat in the first instance, and that he was entitled to hold it until the House was organized and the matter was decided, upon the petition of the contesting members.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said he understood that the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HALSTEAD) claimed the privilege of having his name called as a member of the 26th Congress; and he claims it because the name of the gentleman immediately before him had been called upon a certificate precisely similar to the one which he presented. You have called Mr. RANDOLPH upon a certificate being produced precisely similar to the one produced by Mr. HALSTEAD; and when that gentleman demands that his name shall be called upon the same kind of a certificate, why do you refuse to call it? You have called the name of Mr. RANDOLPH, and every gentleman agrees that you were right in doing so; then should not the gentleman who has last spoken [Mr. HALSTEAD] be entitled to the same privilege, when he has produced the evidence that he is entitled to his seat in precisely the same terms of the one produced by his colleague? He then referred to Jefferson's Manual to show that a member was entitled to certain privileges by virtue of his election. A member might be named upon a committee before he was sworn in, and his certificate of election gave him the privilege of being exempt from arrest. He also read an extract to the effect that every man who has an interest in the matter must at his peril take notice who are members of either House. There were two powers, he said, which the House might exercise in relation to this matter. The one was to pass upon the elections of Representatives, and the other was the power to judge of the validity of those elections. Congress had passed no law to regulate elections, but had left that matter to the States to regulate. In the present case, an election had been held under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and the Governor had sent to this House the proper certificates of election, and it was incompetent for this House to decide upon the validity of this election until it was properly organized, and the usual oaths had been administered to the members. He contended that the certificate of the Governor was prima facie evidence of the right to a seat in the first place, and that the House could not decide upon the validity of the election, until it was properly organized. The certificate of election conferred upon a gentleman all the privileges of a member of the House in the first instance. As he had shown, it protected a gentleman from arrest; and if it protected him from arrest, certainly no man could refuse him any other of the privileges which it might confer upon him. These gentlemen had the certificate of the officer authorized by law to give a certificate, and it seemed to him that it must be the common sense of every man, that they were entitled to their seats until the House decided upon the matter in the usual and proper manner.

Mr. FILLMORE rose for the purpose of asking gentlemen to consent, before debating this matter farther, at least to let all the facts, and the law regarding the case, be laid before them. He was not at all solicitous whether the credentials of the gentlemen from New Jersey which had not been read, or the law of that State on the subject of elections, should be read first. But gentlemen had gone on assuming that certain facts existed of which they had yet no evidence. He hoped, therefore, that the law and the facts would be presented before proceeding any farther.

Mr. SLADE inquired of the CLERK what was the question before the House.

Mr. GARLAND (the CLERK) replied that three propositions had been made. One was that the credentials of the other five members claiming seats from New Jersey should be read; another that the law of the State of New Jersey on the subject of elections be read; and the last, that he (the CLERK) should, passing over the members from New Jersey, whose names had not been called, proceed to call in their order the names of the members from all the other States, respecting whose right to their seats no difficulty had arisen.

Mr. MERCER stated that he had withdrawn his motion to read the law of New Jersey.

Mr. SLADE observed that it had been proposed by the gentleman from New York that the law should be read. Now he desired to know for what purpose the reading of this law was asked for? Was it for the purpose of having any action on it? It would seem to him that it would be idle for the CLERK to rise and read the laws of New Jersey, unless it be for the purpose of enabling him (Mr. S.) and others to decide this question. Now, an objection had been started that he for one could not get over. There was no body as yet competent to decide any question. The CLERK had proceeded to read the names of the members from only a part of the States, amounting to seventy-seven members. Now, the CLERK had not the evidence before him that all these were legally elected. Indeed, he believed, that, as to four-fifths of the members, present, he had no other than newspaper evidence or the evidence of general report, that they were elected. The CLERK, then, had, according to usage, made out a roll of the members of this Congress from the best evidence in his power, and had taken his seat at the table, and called over their names, according to States, until he came to the State of New Jersey, where he stopped, in consequence of a difficulty that presented itself, which he explained to the House. Now the CLERK, as it was apparent to every one, might have proceeded to call over the names of the members in a different order, and no one would have a right to complain. He might have called them over in alphabetical order, for there was nothing obligatory on him to call them over by States. The present rule was merely an arbitrary one, and did not always exist in that body. Well, sir, (continued Mr. S.) the CLERK has presented the name of one member from New Jersey, and reads it, nobody objecting. He then presented the names of five others, and their credentials having been called for, were read,

Then, continued Mr. S. what condition are we placed in? We are proceeding to decide who are, and who are not, entitled to seats from the State of New Jersey, before all the members are called, before they are sworn in, and before a quorum is formed. Can we now decide this question without deciding as to the qualifications of the members from New Jersey, and was the body then in a state to make such a decision? Now this question was the very essence of the whole concern, and we cannot proceed one step, said Mr. S. without deciding it. Then, sir, said he, how can we decide it? Sir, he continued, we cannot decide it at all in the present stage of the proceedings. Some eighty or ninety members only had been called, respecting whose rights to their seats no objection had been made; but there were others in the same situation who had not been called, and who were equally entitled to decide as the first; and he therefore saw no way of getting out of the difficulty into which they had fallen, but by passing over the names of all those members whose right to seats was doubted, and calling the names of those about whom no doubt existed, and by this means form a quorum competent to do business. We might, said Mr. S. talk here till the thirty-first day of December, and be no farther than we are now. But if we proceed in the way suggested, a quorum, when called, would be entitled to decide not only who have the prima facie evidence of membership, but who are finally entitled to hold the contested seats. He was for looking at this matter in a practical manner. Both sets of gentlemen from New Jersey might rise and claim the right to take their seats as members from that State; but, said Mr. S. we cannot now decide between them. He had a great respect for those gentlemen from New Jersey, who claimed their seats under the Governor's certificate, and perhaps they were entitled to their seats; but he did not know that they were. Indeed he did not pretend to know any thing about it, and, therefore, was not qualified to decide at present. He could have wished that the CLERK, the moment the question was raised, instead of submitting the decision of it to the House, had assumed upon himself the responsibility, and proceeded to call over the names of the members from the other States, about whom no difficulty existed, passing over those from the State of New Jersey. There was, in fact, no other way of organizing the House. But suppose the members were all sworn in and a quorum was formed, would they then have the right to decide; and if not, was the question to be settled by agreement among the contesting members? Why, in this way, he would undertake to say it would not be settled in six months. He came then to the conclusion, that the moment a quorum was formed, that quorum had the right of deciding who were entitled to seats, as well as the right of deciding who had the prima facie evidence of their right to them. He believed that a quorum possessed this right, and he founded his belief on that clause of the Constitution which bore on the subject.

I say, (continued Mr. S.) that when a quorum is formed, they are, pro hac vice, a House of Representatives to decide this question. Look at the Constitution, and you will there find that "the House of Representatives shall choose a Speaker." Then, if they may choose a Speaker, why may they not do any other act necessary for their organization? Under all the circumstances, then, he had come to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the question arose with respect to the contested seats of the New Jersey members, before a sufficient number of members had been called to constitute a quorum, there was no way of deciding it in the present stage of the proceedings; and, as far as his humble advice went, he would counsel the CLERK to take the responsibility on himself, and call over the names of the members from the other States, respecting whose right to their seats there was no doubt. The CLERK could not now put any question to the House; and, therefore, he must go on until he can get a sufficient number of names to form a quorum to decide the question.

Mr. MERCER rose, and addressed the House at some length; but, from the noise in the chamber, and his speaking rather in a lower tone than usual, was nearly inaudible throughout. He was understood, however, as contending that it was the duty of the CLERK to call over the names of the gentlemen from New Jersey who claimed to be members in virtue of the Governor's certificate; and that the CLERK, by declining to decide in their favor, had departed from the hitherto established usage of that body. The gentleman from Vermont had said that, as soon as a quorum was formed, this House was competent to decide the question of the qualifications of all the rest of its members. Now, (said Mr. M.) suppose we have called one hundred and twenty-two members, shall they have the power to decide upon the qualifications of all the rest? This was an absurdity the gentleman himself must be struck with. The question then before them, he presumed to be as clear as any that ever was presented before a legislative body. The gentleman from New Jersey, who had the Governor's certificate of their election, were entitled to take and hold their seats, until it was proved that they were not duly elected. Congress had prescribed no rule by which the evidence as to membership should be produced. Congress had left that matter to the States, and the State of New Jersey had declared that the evidence to be adduced by her Representatives, should be the certificate of the Governor. The law in Virginia was different, and the other States had prescribed a different description of evidence; but here was produced the evidence of the membership of these five gentlemen, conformable to the laws of New Jersey, and it was not competent for the CLERK, or the House either, in the present stage of its proceedings, to refuse it. It had been said that there were five other gentlemen here, claiming their seats as members from New Jersey, and the evidence that they adduced was the certificate of the Secretary of State of that State.

Mr. M. then went on at length, that this evidence was informal, not recognised by the laws of New Jersey, and therefore of no authority in that body. The Governor of the State, he said, was the only organ of communication from the State, and the Secretary of State could not be officially known to them. Mr. M. after quoting several cases which he considered as precedents, resumed his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, observed, that in contemplating the course pursued by the CLERK, it would at once spring up to the consideration of the House, the embarrassment that would ensue when they once departed from the established usage of that body since the foundation of the Government. The House must see the evils that would spring up, if they allowed the CLERK to exercise his discretion, and gratify his own feelings, by saying who shall not be considered members of that body. He called gentlemen's attention to the consequences that would ensue from a departure from long established usage, in order that they might pause, and deliberate whether the present advantages they expected to realise would not be more than counterbalanced by the evils that would be likely hereafter to grow out of them. He had taken this occasion to inquire into what had been the established usage of the body, and he found that it had been the immemorial custom for the CLERK to enrol, and call the names of those members who had the certificates of the Governors of their States of their being duly elected. He himself held the certificate of the Governor of the State of Maryland, authenticated by the broad seal of the State; and he would admit that no higher authority than that could be presented in that House? He felt bound, as one of the Representatives whose right to hold a seat was thus supported, to deny the authority of the CLERK to proceed farther, while he withheld the names of the New Jersey members, and would not recognise him in so doing. He did so because the Constitution declared that each House was to judge of the qualifications of its members, and therefore no Clerk, or any other officer, has any discretion in the matter. If the CLERK be permitted to say who he will name as returned as members, or who he will not, he may, in that way, have a majority of members qualified friendly to him, and, in short, exercise all the powers of the House with regard to the qualifications of members; and yet a portion of those who have as much right to their seats as those he has thought proper to call, may find themselves excluded from their seats, and their States from a representation on that floor. Mr. J. denied the power of the CLERK to act, and, as one, he would not recognise his power. After citing various cases of contested elections, which he considered as precedents, Mr. J. went on to contend that the CLERK was bound, by the established usage, to consider the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey as prima facie evidence of the elections, and to enrol and call over the names of the gentlemen certified in them to be returned as members from that State. Mr. J. concluded by expressing the hope that the additional testimony, and the law of the State of New Jersey on the subject of elections, might be read.

Mr. BIDDLE observed that the question was whether this was the appropriate stage for this irregular discussion. Was this the proper time, or, said he, shall we wait for some other time? It is proposed, said Mr. B. that the CLERK shall omit the members from New Jersey, and go on to call the members from the other States; and whenever there is a dispute, or alleged dispute, as to the right of membership, then the CLERK shall pass over the names disputed, and select those who are beyond dispute. It was proposed, in short, that the CLERK should be the judge. Now there appeared to be some degree of plausibility in this proposition. The course thus proposed seemed to be decorous, and free from embarrassment. But, said Mr. B. do you not see that an enormous abuse of power might arise from the precedent thus to be established for the next Congress? If that course be adopted now, it will be adopted forever hereafter, and whenever a Clerk shall undertake to say that the seats of gentlemen are contested. Do you not see that at the opening of every succeeding Congress, the CLERK may thus dispute the seats of his adversaries? And if the result is to be, that the judges will be narrowed down to those whose seats are not disputed, you will not have a case of an undisputed seat. It will then be assumed that the being called by the CLERK is worth something, and it will be worth striking for. With that argument before you, do you not see, continued Mr. B. the monstrous abuses that will grow up if this precedent should now be set? What was the present position of that body? What was the general usage? I take it, said Mr. B. that the CLERK is but the mouthpiece of the body—a body not yet organized, it was true, but a body competent for the despatch of busines—and has no right to act but in accordance with its established usages. Does not your language [addressing the CLERK] admit that much? You look round you, and ask us to instruct you in your duty. You have decided that the credentials of the members of Massachusetts are in due form, and you have invested them with the badge of office. Why did you do this? You exercised some power here, for you declared that those members were entitled to their seats. You examined their credentials, and you examined the law, as it was your duty to do, and you decided that they were entitled to their seats. Let us come to the modus operandi. I say that, where a case comes up precisely similar to the one you have acted upon, you are bound to act upon it, and decide it in the same manner. You are bound to conform to the law and the usage as much in the one case as in the other. It is not only your duty, imposed upon you by this body, but having discharged that duty in the case of Massachusetts, you are bound to do it in the case of New Jersey. It seems to be the plain nature of your duty from what you have already done. Do these credentials come up to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of New Jersey? If they do not, and your judgment is at fault, then your plain duty is to refer your doubts to the House. But if they do come up to the Constitution and the law, as it is contended they do, then you have no right to set them aside, but you are bound to call them, as you have done in the case of the State of Massachusetts. If you make an erroneous decision, why then there is an appeal to the House; but if you ask its decision in small matters, you must ask it in great ones. But, (continued Mr. B.) I say that from the nature of things, you must exercise a sound discretion; the onus is thrown on your shoulders and you are bound to act; but when, from doubt or uncertainty, you are unable to decide, you must ask the decision of the House.

Mr. SLADE said that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] had stated a portion of his argument as an absurdity. Now, said Mr. S. I did not mean to be understood as asserting that as soon as a quorum is formed it is competent to decide upon the qualifications of all who might happen to come after them. This would indeed be an absurdity that he never contemplated. But what he meant was that, in virtue of the power of the Clerk of the House, derived from immemorial usage, he would, when a quorum was formed, have a right to put it to that quorum to decide a question that might be raised as to the prima facie evidence of a member to the seat he claimed—a decision which he had no right to make himself. Nobody, however, would pretend to say that a quorum of one hundred and twenty-two members, who happened to be the first called, would have the right to decide on the qualifications of all those coming after them. The CLERK would be bound to go through the whole twenty-six States, stopping only at those where the seats were contested, and where the CLERK was in doubt with respect to the evidence of election. The CLERK would be bound, by the spirit of the usage as well as by his feelings as a man of honor, to go through the whole roll of those whom he had ascertained, by whatever evidence was before him, were without dispute entitled to their seats. After he had gone through the roll of those about whom there was no dispute, and came to those whose rights to seats were disputed, then, if he took it upon himself to decide who was entitled, or left it to the House to decide that question, there would be a competent tribunal either to entertain an appeal from his decision, or to decide the question itself. Now, he he would leave it to the House to say what should the CLERK do. Would gentlemen not see that if they imposed a burden on him of deciding, they imposed a burden on him too heavy for him to bear; and that if they compelled him to make the decision, he might make it in a way that would involve greater evils than they sought to avoid. Something must be done to organize the House, and who was to do it? The CLERK must proceed according to immemorial usage—

Mr. MERCER. How was the first Congress organized?

Mr. SLADE. Some gentleman, I presume, who had the most gray hairs, was called upon by general consent to preside as moderator, and so acted till the body was organized. Mr. S. did not say but that the House could proceed in that manner now, and that it could put the CLERK out of his seat, and call upon the gentleman from Virginia himself to act as moderator. But the CLERK had not abused his trust. He had not been accused of exercising too much power; on the contrary, it was complained of him that he declined exercising any power at all. Mr. S. did not mean to be understood as saying that any man might come here, and, by saying that he contested the seats of members regularly returned, make it the duty of the CLERK to omit calling the name of such member. His idea was, that, in order to justify the CLERK in omitting to call the name of a returned member, and referring the matter to the House, there must be some color of a claim, as the lawyers say, to contest the right to the seat. If a man comes here with the spurious certificate signed by a Governor of a State, and another man already has a certificate from the same Governor, then on that Governor let that responsibility rest. So, if two men bring certificates, one from a Governor and the other from a Secretary of State, then upon the Governor or the Secretary who has certified falsely let the responsibility rest. But suppose, upon the formation of a quorum, some member should get up and say, I move that A B is entitled to a seat here. Would he not do it on his responsibility? Suppose that one hundred and twenty-two members, after forming a quorum should decide that A B is entitled to a seat—would they not do it in their responsibility? There might be abuse of power, but an abuse of power was no authority for its non-existence. The gentleman from New Jersey said that when the CLERK came to a which he was unable to decide, he must leave it to the House; but the question was, who were the House. Suppose the yeas and nays were to be ordered, who were in that event to vote? It was a difficulty that they could not get out of without proceeding in the manner he had proposed. He for one was prepared to do his duty, and leave the consequences to take their course. He could not look forward to consequences. If the result of all this should be, that these five gentlemen from New Jersey should be prevented from taking their seats, and acting here, great injustice might be done them; but if that injustice should be done in the exercise of a correct rule of action, we must leave it to the community to say whether we have acted correctly or not.

Mr. SERGEANT observed, that as he understood the question presented, the doubts and difficulties that had arisen, seemed to him to have been in consequence of the CLERK having departed from the plain usage that had prevailed in that body for many years past. It was understood from the CLERK, that there was a contest respecting the rights of certain gentlemen to their seats, as Representatives from New Jersey, and the worthy gentleman from Vermont on his right, [Mr. SLADE] thought that if there was but a color of a claim, it was sufficient to authorize the CLERK to pass over the State of New Jersey in calling the roll. According to this doctrine, a gentleman might be kept out of his seat, no matter how clear the evidence of his right to it was, no matter how conformable his credentials might be to the Constitution and the laws of the State he belongs to, provided somebody has a color of a claim to contest his right. The gentleman says the CLERK is not competent to decide. To decide upon what? The color of a claim? No matter how slight the evidence might be, yet, if the color of a claim was presented, the CLERK was to suffer a sovereign State to be deprived of her representation on this floor, and the certificate of her Executive, under the broad seal of the State, was to be set at naught. Mr. S. did not so understand the duty of the CLERK. He understood that officer's duty to be confined to the verification of the credentials in point of form and accuracy, and nothing more. Having ascertained that the credentials are accurate, and possessing the requisite formalities, he is bound to enrol the names of the members presenting them, and to call them over in their order. In this case, the CLERK, to avoid having the appearance of making a decision, keeps from their seats five gentlemen, who have the prima facie evidence of being entitled to them, (and he did not know for how long they might be kept out,) and who might appear hereafter, upon proper investigation, to be the best entitled, because there appeared the color of a claim to contest them. In taking this course, it appeared to him that the CLERK had mistaken his duty. In order to come at a conclusion with regard to the genuineness and requisite formality of the claims presented, the CLERK was bound to look at the laws of the States from which they were presented; and if they conformed to those laws, the CLERK had no authority to look further. How stood the case before them? Here were five gentlemen, having the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, under the great seal of the State, that they are duly elected as Representatives from that State. Now, had any body any doubt as to the genuineness of these certificates? Had the CLERK any doubts respecting them? Were they not in conformity with the law of the State of New Jersey on that subject? He knew what was in that law without any reading it at all; and he averred that, word for word, letter for letter, and comma for comma, the certificates of the Governor presented by these gentlemen, conformed to it. Was there any thing else alleged against it. Was there any doubt about the genuineness of these certificates? Did the CLERK himself entertain any doubts? He did not say so. He had said that there was a contest respecting the seats of the members from the State of New Jersey, and that he could not undertake to decide it, when these gentlemen were in the House with these commissions, according to the law of New Jersey; and they were, therefore, in his opinion, entitled to hold their seats, according to the Constitution of the United States, until they are displaced by the House. He thought a due respect to the Executive of one of the sovereign States of this Union required that those who would impeach these certificates, should not come here with a fancied claim, but should show that they were not in accordance with the laws of the State. Mr. S. said he understood from the CLERK, that he had a certificate from the Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey, that five other gentlemen were elected as Representatives from that State; and that this certificate was also accompanied by the great seal of the State. But it was remarkable that, in looking at the law of the State of New Jersey relative to elections, there was not a single word about the Secretary of State in it. The Secretary of State had not even the custody of the papers relative to elections, but they were confided exclusively to the Governor and Council. Mr. S. after contending that the certificate of the Governor was the only authentic evidence that could properly be received from New Jersey, went on to say that this was the first time that the certificate of the Governor of a State had ever been questioned in that body, and quoted several cases which he considered as precedents.

Messrs. RANDOLPH and SLADE made some observations, which were not heard distinctly enough to report.

Mr. BYNUM observed, that certain assumptions and statements had been made for facts which did not exist, and which were not facts; and he, therefore, to prevent any erroneous impressions from arising from such statements, would endeavor to set gentlemen right in a few particulars. He knew that it was the practice with many in that House to assume for fact that which they wished to be so, and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] of whom this practice was characteristic, had assumed it as a fact that this was the first time that the seats of any members had been contested who were elected according to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of their State. If this was the fact, he presumed that this was the first time that the gentleman presumed to say that he and those who acted with him were alone, of all the members of the House, competent to judge what was the Constitution and the laws on this subject. Why, sir, said Mr. B. if the law and the Constitution is so clear, I presume that no one would object to these gentlemen taking their seats. But, sir, that is the issue. We doubt whether the law and the Constitution is so clearly in their favor. We undertake to say that they are not elected according to the Constitution and the laws of New Jersey. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that they are; but there are other gentlemen in this body who have the right to exercise their judgment with regard to the Constitution and the laws of New Jersey, as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his friends. The gentleman seemed to think that the passing over the names of those gentlemen who have the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey would be disrespectful to that high functionary. Ay, sir, are there not others whose opinions are to be respected as well as that of the Governor? I say that the sovereign people of New Jersey are entitled to some respect, and that the Representatives that they have sent here are as much entitled to credence as those commissioned by the Governor. We are not the representatives of the Governor, but of the sovereign people of New Jersey. There is a contest here between the Governor on one side, and the people of New Jersey on the other; and the people call on us to do them justice. They contend that the Governor has committed an outrage upon their rights; and shall we not listen to them because it may be considered disrespectful to the Governor if we do so? These are important facts, and must be decided on before we can go into a decision as to which set of gentlemen are entitled to their seats as Representatives from New Jersey. Gentlemen, said Mr. B. deceive themselves, according to my mind. If their object is to get these names called before organizing the House, what is to prevent us from having the names of the five other gentlemen called? But, say gentlemen, the Governor of New Jersey has given his certificates, and those only who hold them are entitled to their seats. To this we answer, have not the people of New Jersey elected their Representatives, and sent sufficient evidence of it here; and have they not a right to be heard? These are solemn questions, Mr. CLERK, and deserve to be seriously weighed and considered, to arrive at a correct understanding of this subject. Mr. B. said he deemed the whole of the propositions made by the gentlemen on the other side to be utterly impracticable. We cannot, said he, act at all in this matter until we adopt the proposition of my friend from Virginia. I know that before we can decide understandingly upon this matter, we must take into consideration the laws of the State of New Jersey bearing upon it; but we cannot do it now, because it is not the proper time. But here is the sacred chart (holding up the Constitution) by which we are to direct our course, and by that, at a proper time, we shall make our decision. We must then take up the law of New Jersey; but when we do so, we must must not forget to take into consideration the facts on which the election took place; and as, according to the Constitution, each House is to be the judge of the qualification of its members, we must judge of the qualifications of these gentlemen and their competitors with all the facts, as well as the law, before us. If, then, it should be found that the Governor of New Jersey had proceeded without authority of law—if it should be found that he had dared to usurp the authority of this House, there his certificate should be treated with the contempt that it deserved. But Mr. B. doubted whether the debate on the present occasion had not been thrown out as a mere catch to control public opinion. If he was not mistaken, when the proper time arrived, and when the facts should be brought out, he doubted very much whether the Constitution and the laws of New Jersey would bear out the Governor in his high-handed proceedings. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania contended that now was the time to make this investigation. How was it to be done? It appeared to him, Mr. B. said, that they could not proceed one step in the matter, until the House was organized. To proceed farther, was clearly impracticable. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reflected upon the conduct of the CLERK, and it appeared to him with very little justice. Why, sir, (addressing the CLERK) you would be unworthy the place you hold, if you had acted otherwise? What had the CLERK done, he would ask gentleman? Why, upon a question of doubt and difficulty, he declines the responsibility of deciding, and refers the matter to the House. Mr. B. hoped that a Clerk of that House never might be permitted to decide upon questions so vitally affecting the interests of the people of this Union, as this did. Mr. B. had no doubt that if the CLERK should go on calling over the names of gentlemen whose seats were contested in the manner the gentleman from Pennsylvania contended for, that the moment the names of one party were called, a motion would be made to call the names of the other party; and if one of them was permitted to vote, there was no power on earth that could exclude the other. He would ask gentlemen, then, on the other side, what could they gain by pressing this question? What (said he) have we as yet done towards organizing the House? Nothing. He therefore thought that the course pointed out by the gentleman from Vermont, was the best that they could pursue—that is, said he, proceed to organize the House, and decide on the evidence of these gentlemen to their seats afterwards.

Mr. SLADE explained, that he only meant a partial organization of the House, so as to form a quorum competent to decide as to the evidence of membership.

Mr. BYNUM continued his remarks at some length, taking various precedents bearing on the case, particularly that of Moore and Letcher, a case exactly in point, in which neither party was permitted to take a seat, until a final decision was made by the House, after a thorough investigation of the merits of the case.

Mr. GALBRAITH said he could not understand the course of argument of some gentlemen here. They charge the CLERK with usurpation of power in the course he has chosen to take in announcing the conflicting claims to the five seats from New Jersey, and urge upon us the danger of a Clerk undertaking to determine who are entitled to seats; that he has no right, no power, to decide; and yet, with the same breath, they condemn him because he has declined giving any decision, expressing his doubts and inability to determine. It had been said by the CLERK that he could not decide on the conflicting claims. It was therefore to be taken that such was the case. Who was to be the judge of that but the CLERK himself? Can any other gentleman judge better than he can? Suppose the CLERK had undertaken to decide in favor of the other claimants, than those from whom the objection comes; then, indeed, might there have been some ground for the charge of usurpation of power; but in avoiding to decide, and proceeding to call the list of members whose claims were undisputed, until there should be an undoubted quorum competent to decide, he could not see the shadow of foundation for the charge of usurpation.

He said it had been spoken of as an extraordinary course, a disrespect offered to the State of New Jersey, that the members from that State should be passed over until the list was gone through. He would ask what right, as a matter of right, New Jersey had to be called before Pennsylvania? It was a mere order of calling, based upon the geographical position of the several States; which had, it was true, been generally adopted by the House, as a matter of convenience, not predicated either upon the age, size, or population of the States, but commencing in the East, and going though to the extreme West; and had been sometimes reversed in calling for petitions, resolutions, &c. No rights of New Jersey were, therefore, compromitted or injured by the proposed course of calling the list of undisputed members, when there would be a competent number to decide upon something. At present it was useless to discuss—there was no body competent to decide upon any question. Is was the only practicable course that could be pursued. It did not even involve the question of organizing prior to determining the right to seat of the New Jersey claimants. When there should be a sufficient number called, of unquestioned members, to form a quorum competent to decide, as there undoubtedly would be when the list was gone through, then it would be determined whether we should organize first, and decide upon those claims afterwards, or decide upon the prima facie right to the seats before organizing, and determine the permanent right after the House should be regularly organized.

While he was up, he felt called upon to say a word or two in relation to himself, as connected with this New Jersey affair. He was not in the habit of replying to newspaper articles, but a paragraph had found its way into the columns of a number of respectable journals in the country, and one in this city, (the National Intelligencer,) taken from a paper published in his district, calculated to make an unfavorable impression upon the minds of his fellow members, many of whom were strangers to him, and he felt it as a duty to himself to remove any such impression which might have been made. He was reported in that paragraph to have declared, at a public meeting, that if the returned members from New Jersey should attempt to take their seats, there would be a mob, etc. It was true there was a public meeting, and it was also true that, by invitation, he had submitted some remarks at that meeting, the purport of which, he presumed, it was not important he should repeat here. It was sufficient for him to say that the article alluded to was a total misrepresentation of his views, and a gross perversion of the language used by him on that occasion.

Mr. EVERETT contended that according to Parliamentary usage, and the established custom of that body, it was the duty of the CLERK to enrol the names of those gentlemen from New Jersey who claimed their seats in virtue of the Governor's certificate, and to call them over in their order. He contended that the CLERK had no right to depart in this instance from the established custom, because there was a contest regarding the seats claimed by these gentleman, and that he was as much bound to call over their names as to call over the name of the gentleman from the same State, whose right to his seat was not not contested.

Mr. CRAIG addressed the House at some length. From the confusion prevailing at the time in the House, the commencement of this gentleman's remarks was not heard. He was understood, however, as sustaining the course pursued by the CLERK in declining to take the responsibility of deciding who were entitled to the seats from New Jersey. He denied that the CLERK was bound by the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, as contended for by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, [Messrs. BIDDLE and SERGEANT] and thought the evidence of the popular vote was entitled to as much weight as the certificate. The prima facie evidence had been heretofore taken under the rule of convenience, but he would ask if, in a case of palpable fraud, gentlemen would abide by this old rule of prima facie evidence, in defiance of truth and justice, and the strongest documentary testimony. After all, all they were aiming at was to ascertain whether this or that five of the New Jersey gentlemen were entitled to the seats; and, therefore, if upon examination it should be found that those who did not come with the Governor's certificate had the majority of votes, would they put in this prima facie blind to deprive them of their seats? Mr. C. agreed with the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] that the only proper course to be taken now, would be to pass by the names of the members, whose seats were contested, and call over all the other members so as to form a quorum. But, said Mr. C. take the contrary course, and you will be driven to the necessity of saying that the Governor's certificate, with the seal of the State of New Jersey, elects Representatives here. It might be true that this certificate was evidence, so far as it went; but suppose it states what is not true—and it is made apparent to us that it contains a false statement—what, then, are we to do? Are we to shut out the truth, because we have the certificate of a Governor, and the seal of a State? He knew of no law or rule of this House requiring them to receive only that particular species of evidence, to the exclusion of all other. It was, therefore, his opinion, that they ought to exclude both sets of members claiming to be Representatives from the State of New Jersey, until the House was organized, when it would be competent for it to settle every doubtful question.

Mr. E. concluded by expressing the opinion that the best way of getting over the difficulty would be to adopt the course proposed by the gentlemen from Virginia and Vermont; and that was, to pass over the State of New Jersey, and call the names of all the other members whose seats were not contested.

Mr. MAXWELL addressed the House at some length in support of his right to take a seat, arguing that the evidence he presented was as strong as that presented by any member, and that he had as much right to take his seat as any of those whose names had been already called. The certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, with the broad seal of the State, was a document that the CLERK, in his opinion, had no right to pass by; and he considered that it was the CLERK's duty to call his name in its order.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky addressed the House at some length in support of the claims of the gentlemen who presented themselves with the Governor's certificate, taking the same ground as that taken by Messrs. BIDDLE and SERGEANT; after which,

Mr. BYNUM, having obtained the floor, gave way to

Mr. MERCER, on whose motion, and by general consent,

The House adjourned.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GLOBE.

I observe in the reference you made in your paper of last evening to my remarks yesterday upon the New Jersey case, the following: "He (Mr. SLADE) approved of the course taken by the CLERK in declining to take the responsibility on himself of deciding who were entitled to the seats from New Jersey, and thought that any other course would have been a usurpation of unauthorized authority on the part of that officer."

Your reporter mistook me. I maintained that it was competent for the CLERK to decide that he would not place the names of Mr. AYCRIGG and others, claiming seats, on the roll, if in his opinion there was such conflict between their returns and those of their competitors, as to render it doubtful who had the proper legal returns, or certificates of election. It was his power to do as he had done that I vindicated, and not the propriety of its exercise. Upon that question I gave no opinion, because the grounds on which he had decided to exercise the power in this case, were not before the House, and, as I thought, and still think, could not properly be until it should appear that there was a quorum present to form a House of Representatives, competent to hear, and act on them. If the papers presented to the CLERK as credentials, by the gentlemen contesting the right of Messrs. AYCRIGG and others to seats, were such as I have been informed they were, it seems to me the CLERK erred in deciding that they impaired, in any degree, the title of the latter gentlemen to take their seats. But this was a question with which, as I viewed the matter, we had, at that stage of the proceedings, nothing to do. The CLERK had exercised his power of deciding, in the first instance, upon the "returns," and his decision was conclusive until overruled by the House; which could not be done until there should appear to be a quorum of the members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress present, to form a House.

I need hardly add, after the above explanation, that I did not say that "any other course (than that of declining to take the responsibility of deciding who were entitled to seats) would have been a usurpation on the part of the CLERK.

Respectfully yours,
WILLIAM SLADE.

December 3, 1839.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 3, 1839.

The Hon. WM. D. MERRICK, elected by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March last, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD,

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet to morrow at 12 o'clock, and daily thereafter at the same hour until otherwise ordered.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, Dec. 3, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, m. Mr. HUGH A. GARLAND (Clerk of the former House) called the House to order, and stated that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] had possession of the floor at the time of the adjournment on yesterday, and, with the permission of that gentleman, he would beg leave to make a respectful appeal to the House. No man, said Mr. G. feels more than I do the delicacy and difficulty of his position. From the beginning I have felt a high responsibility resting upon me, and before God and my country, I assure you I have had but one motive, and that was to do my duty justly and impartially, without regard to personal or party considerations. I have been placed in a novel and unprecedented situation. All the cases of contested elections heretofore presented, have been presented to the House of Representatives itself, upon the petitions of the claiming members, and the CLERK had nothing to do with them. The only variation from that rule was in the case of Messrs. Moore and Letcher, of Kentucky. Both those gentlemen presented themselves before the House, and claimed the right to have seats, and the House was compelled to take the matter into consideration; and the House might, perhaps, have remained unorganized for a fortnight, if those two gentlemen had not voluntarily withdrawn their case until after the organization. The present case, however, was one entirely different from the one referred to. The difficulty in the present case was presented to the CLERK himself. Conflicting evidence was brought into his office, and what was he to do? What was I to do in this case? Was I to take upon myself the powers of the House of Representatives—the powers which the Constitution has given to it to decide on the qualifications of its members? I assure gentlemen that I have felt the delicacy of my situation, and I have labored assiduously to be enabled to come to correct conclusions in relation to this question. I, therefore, now respectfully appeal to this body, to permit me to make a statement which I have prepared in justification of my course on the present occasion; and I think the request is not unprecedented, when the conduct of a public officer has been brought in question, as mine has been on the present occasion.

Mr. JENIFER asked if the CLERK designed to review his decision of yesterday, and call the members from New Jersey, so that the House might go on without his interference.

The CLERK stated that he had taken the course on yesterday, which he felt it to be his duty to take, and he could not depart from it until he was satisfied that his course was then wrong. All he now asked, was, to make a respectful appeal to the House, and lay before gentlemen the grounds and motives which induced him to take the course he did.

Mr. JENIFER contended that it was the duty of the CLERK to call the names of the five members from New Jersey returned by the Governor, and that he had no right to interrupt the organization of the House by refusing to call them, when no objection had been made to having their names called.

Mr. SLADE here rose and made a correction of an error in the report of his remarks of yesterday in one of the papers of the city, which was not heard at the Reporter's desk.

Mr. ATHERTON hoped that the CLERK might be permitted to make the statement which he desired to make to the House, without objection being made on the part of any member—

Cries of "Proceed! proceed!"

Mr. TALIAFERRO rose, and inquired of the CLERK if he had in his possession more than one return from the State of New Jersey, such as the law of New Jersey prescribed?

Cries of "Proceed! proceed!" "No, no."

Mr. STANDEFER objected to the CLERK's making any statement. Let some of his friends on the floor make a statement, if a statement was necessary.

Mr. WISE thought it due to the CLERK—in the situation which usage, if not law, and usage in this case he regarded as law, had placed him—to be permitted to make a statement. He was very desirous to hear a statement, and doubtless other gentlemen were desirous to hear a statement, of the reasons why the CLERK had not discharged the duty which law and usage had imposed upon him. He hoped, therefore, that all gentlemen would acquiesce in hearing this statement, and perhaps their action might be influenced by it. It was only persuasive, and not authoritative; and certainly he thought gentlemen ought to agree to hear any evidence on the subject which the CLERK might have to present. Some called for the reading of the law on yesterday, some for the reading of the certificates, and some desired that the names of the five members from New Jersey might be called; and as he made no statement on yesterday why the names were not placed on the roll and called, he thought this statement ought now to be heard by universal consent.

When Mr. W. resumed his seat, there were cries to the CLERK to "Go on."

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky said, for one, he entered his solemn protest against the reading of this prepared document by the CLERK. He asked if the Representatives of the people were to have their business interrupted by their CLERK, and to sit there to hear a prepared statement read from the Clerk's desk, calculated, if not drawn up, for the purpose of making a false impression in the country; and he thought, when his friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] agreed to hear this statement read, he had not reflected sufficiently on the subject. In his view, it was no matter who rose and objected here—it was no matter what the newspapers of the country had published—it was no matter what affidavits the loafers of New Jersey had sent in to arrest the laws of New Jersey. It was the duty of the CLERK to take the evidence produced, in conformity to the laws of New Jersey, and it was not his duty to rise and make statements here in relation to the matter. Suppose the CLERK did go on and make this statement, would we go on and discuss this matter coolly where we left off? No, sir. The moment that he was done, new points would be raised, and we would be involved in greater difficulties than we are at present. We would have difficulty enough in deciding the matter, if we went on discussing this matter now, without permitting new points to be raised by the CLERK; and he protested against hearing any statement from him.

Mr. WISE was sorry to be thrust into a debate with his own friends; but he thought if the gentleman from Kentucky would listen to what he had to say, he could convince him that it was proper, legal, formal, and orderly, that the CLERK should make this statement. It was true that the CLERK was not technically an officer of the House; but, by the law of usage and necessity, he was always permitted to hold the place which he now held. He was the quondam Clerk of the last Congress, and presented himself here first to render to his successor in office the records of the House; secondly, the CLERK was here by the law of usage, and the ordinance of 1785, imposed the duty upon the CLERK of the last Congress to keep a roll of members of Congress, and to call over that roll at their meeting.

Mr. W. here read the ordinance of 1785; and also a resolution of 1791, to show that the CLERK was sworn to perform this duty. He contended that by this resolution, if the CLERK was sworn to perform this duty, and that, if he did not perform it, he whould be disregarding his duty. He was under a moral obligation to perform it; but the members of the House were not under this moral obligation, inasmuch as no oath had been yet administered to them. The CLERK was bound by an oath to perform his duty, but the members of this House were not under this sacred obligation. The CLERK was bound by his oath to discharge his duty; but the members of the House were presumed to be partisans. They were presumed to come from the heated mass of political fermentation. We come here (said Mr. W.) with all our partisan feeling—the blind and devoted slaves of party—but the CLERK was presumed to be above this political fanaticism. The CLERK was bound by his oath to be free from political influences, and, by the resolution referred to, to be in office until he was superseded by his successor. Mr. W. read the ordinance of 1785, prescribing the duties of the Secretary of Congress; and said if he had been on intimate terms with the CLERK, he would have gone to his room and appealed to him, as an officer by usage, if not law, as a Virginia gentleman, bound by a solemn oath to perform a certain duty, and as a Christian, who needs no oath to bind him to discharge the duty which this resolution and the law of usage imposed upon him. The CLERK had stated to the House on yesterday that he was not a judge, and verily he (Mr. W.) agreed that he was not a judge, and according to his view of the Constitution, no man here was a judge of his prima facie right to a seat on that floor. Neither the CLERK, nor any other man now present, could judge of his credentials. Under the Constitution he considered that, at the present stage of proceedings, they were in transitu between the House of Representatives and their constituents, and no one had the right to decide upon his credentials.

Mr. W. then read the clause from the Constitution which gave to the States the power at present to regulate elections, cited the mode by which the Representatives from Virginia obtained their certificates of election, and contended that when that certificate was obtained, as it was there, from the sheriffs of their district, there was no power to prevent them from taking their seats in this House in the first instance. When a gentleman here presented the evidence that he was entitled to his seat, it was not the duty of the CLERK to decide judicially upon it. He was not a judicial officer, but a mere ministerial officer. His duty was merely to receive the evidence presented to him, and enter it. Had the CLERK the evidence in this case? If so, why did he not enter the names of the five New Jersey members upon the roll. The CLERK had said that he is not the person to decide the question who are entitled to seats, and has referred the matter to us; but we have no more right to decide it at present than he has; and the question will necessarily come back to the CLERK at last to be decided; and this was the view which he desired to press upon the CLERK, and make him, as a man situated above party, as a sworn officer, and as a Christian, do that directly which he would be forced to do indirectly. The CLERK has said he was not to take upon himself to decide on this question, but refers it to the House, as if we were a convention of ministers, who had the power to decide on each other's credentials; but when you put the question as to whether the credentials of the five gentlemen from New Jersey shall be received, who shall vote upon it, Mr. AYCRIGG and his political friends, or Mr. DICKERSON and his political friends? In refusing to decide on this question, the CLERK does decide. The failure to enter the names of the five members from New Jersey has all the effect of a judgment—the potential effect of a judgment. It will be impossible for the House to decide upon this question, and it will devolve upon the CLERK or some one out of it to decide. We come back, then, to you, Mr. CLERK, and you may as well exercise that judgment at once, which you will be compelled to do at last. He contended that the evidence in this case was the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, and that must be conclusive in the first instance, because the moment gentlemen attempted to go behind that, as some gentlemen had suggested on this floor, they converted this massive, unwieldy body into a Committee of Elections, and it would have to go back to the people of New Jersey and be carted about from one district to another, to examine into the frauds which were generally committed on both sides at elections, which would lead them into interminable difficulties. The CLERK has said that he could not decide upon these certificates, but, at the same time, he has decided upon them. He has decided that Mr. RANDOLPH has a certificate in the proper form, and has put his name upon the roll. Well, if his certificate is properly presented to him, and in a proper form, are not the certificates of the other five New Jersey members in proper form? They are precisely in the same form of Mr. RANDOLPH's. If his is good, theirs are good, and if his is bad theirs are bad. If the CLERK has not violated his duty in placing Mr. RANDOLPH's name upon the roll, it cannot be a violation of his duty to place the names of Mr. AYCRIGG and his colleagues on the roll. The certificate of the Governor in their case was prima facie evidence of their right to a seat, and neither the CLERK nor the House, at the present time, had the right to deprive them of taking their seats. Suppose (said Mr. W.) objection should be made to my taking my seat, because some one should pretend that he had a right to it; would I permit the CLERK to prevent me from participating in the organization of the House in such case? Has the CLERK any right or power, under the Constitution and the laws, to prevent any body from exercising his right here, when he has the evidence that he has a right to his seat in his possession. No; the CLERK had no right to prevent him from taking his seat when he had his certificate in his pocket; and although he did not desire to preach revolutionary doctrines, he would not be put to the test for all that the world could give him. Neither you, Mr. CLERK, nor any one else here, had the right or the power, to judge on the matter which the seven sheriffs of my district alone have the right to decide.

Mr. W. considered that the most proper mode of organization would be, for the CLERK to call over the States, and then each member could rise and present his credentials; and when they presented their credentials in the proper form, they were entitled to their seats, and there was no power to prevent them from taking their seats, and holding them until the House, after it was properly organized, investigated the case. He considered the duty of the CLERK to be a plain and simple duty, and he again appealed to him, as a sworn officer, to say whether it was not his duty to enter upon the roll the names of the gentlemen who had the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, under the broad seal of the State, whatever might be his convictions as to what ought to have been done by the Governor; and if the CLERK had to decide this question at last, indirectly, was it not better that he should decide it at once?

In conclusion, he said that he desired to hear what the CLERK had to say, and hoped he would be permitted to make the statement he had prepared, because he wished the CLERK to tell him, as a sworn officer, as a native born gentleman of his own mother State, and as a Christian, ready to answer before God and his country, why he had not discharged his duty in the present case.

Mr. BRIGGS was understood to say that he thought the CLERK ought to be heard by the House, as he might probably give gentlemen some reasons which might satisfy them that he was right. Besides, the members here assembled were discussing, and had been discussing, the propriety of the course which the CLERK had pursued, and it was but proper that he should give the reasons which induced him to pursue this course. After this, the discussion on the floor might go on; and perhaps it would satisfy the CLERK that he was wrong in the course he had pursued, and he might be induced to take a different course. It seemed to him but common justice that this gentleman, who was placed in a delicate and responsible position, and who was acting in a manner new and unprecedented, should have the privilege of being heard by the House.

Mr. WHITE replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and contended that the ordinance of 1785, and the resolution of 1791, in relation to the duties of the Secretary of Congress, were no more binding upon the present body than the rules of the last Congress. Their force was only recognised by courtesy, and they had no binding effect upon this body. The present CLERK had undertaken to do what no Clerk had ever before done, and he hoped his friends would not permit him to pursue the course attempted to be pursued. He thought there was something to be seen in the course which the CLERK was pursuing; and he hoped he would not be permitted to make any statements to this body in relation to the present case. He had no desire to deprive this quasi CLERK of any of his rights; but if he desired to publish the reasons which induced him to pursue the course he had, he was at liberty to do so; but he objected to the CLERK making the statement in this body.

Mr. CUSHING desired to address himself to the gentlemen here present; for although he recognised the CLERK in his place as the individual who was to keep the records of the House, and as the individual who, under the order of the House, could put questions, yet we were here the Representatives of the sovereign States of the Union, recognising each other as such, and he desired to address a word to gentlemen here present, on the issue presented to them. He desired to hear what the CLERK had to say, and he hoped he might be permitted to make a statement, for he thought the circumstance demanded that there should be explanation, so that we might know, and the people might know, why it was that the proceedings of the Representatives of the sovereign States of this Union were here arrested by the gentleman who sits in that chair. What are we? What constitutes this assembly? We are Representatives of the sovereign States of this Union, and we respectively come here armed with the documentary evidence of our right to seats which the laws of the States communicate to us; and we come here, and take our seats of right, and not because our names may or may not be entered upon the roll by the CLERK.

The members from Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, &c. were called by the CLERK, and when he came to the State of New Jersey, he called the name of one gentleman, upon the commission of the Governor of that State. But why did the CLERK not proceed? Had not Messrs. AYCRIGG, HALSTEAD, &c. identically the same evidence of their right to seats? Had they not the same title to seats that Mr. RANDOLPH had? There could be no good reason given, under the Constitution and laws of the land, why the names of these gentlemen should not be placed on the roll, because the moment you go behind the certificate of the Governor, you raise the case of a contested election, and that can only be done after the House is properly organized. It may be that Mr. DICKERSON and his associates are entitled to their seats, but we cannot act on that question now. We are only now to act upon the certificate, which is of record in the CLERK's office. Under this state of facts, he desired to know why it was that the certificates of the five members from the State of New Jersey, under the great seal of the State, and made out in pursuance of the laws of the State, and which was recognised by the CLERK in the case of Mr. RANDOLPH, should be disregarded by the CLERK. He desired to know of the CLERK why it was, when the same evidence was presented to him in the case of these five gentlemen, which was presented in the case of Mr. RANDOLPH, that he refused to put their names upon the roll, and proceed with the organization of the body. He hoped that the House would hear the statement of the CLERK, but when that statement was laid before them, he hoped they should come to some practical point. We have been debating intricate and abstract questions, and he had been surprised to hear gentlemen attempt to nullify and stultify their own powers, by arguing that we could not vote, and decide upon any question. Why can we not decide? We cannot choose a Speaker without deciding. When gentlemen say we cannot vote and decide, they also say it is not in order to choose a Speaker, for that will be the next step in our proceedings. Gentlemen were greatly mistaken when they argued that we could not vote. We can vote, and he supposed we would be voting viva voce by and by. The proof was conclusive that we could vote and decide, but he looked a little farther. We were not sworn members of this House. True it is we have our certificates, but we are an unorganized body, yet we are a body of men with souls, as well as bodies, and may we not make an issue, and decide on that issue? He considered that we had the inherent right to vote and decide. In the House of Commons, from whence we derive all our ideas of Parliamentary practice, the Clerk puts questions at their meeting, and it is so entered on their Journal, by order of the persons present. He does so because he is their servant, and not their master. The Clerk there puts questions, not as the presiding officer, but as the agent and servant of the House. There is an inherent necessity that we should vote and decide on questions, and it was idle to argue that we could do nothing but by unanimous consent. It was next to impossible to find unanimous consent on any question. He denied any such principle. We may decide upon questions put by the CLERK, or we may appoint a chairman to put those questions, as is done in conventions. These were his views, and for the purpose of bringing them to a practical test, Mr. C. moved the members that the CLERK to the last House of Representatives have permission to read the statement that he has requested leave to read, and that the question on this motion be put by the CLERK.

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] whether he waived his objection to the CLERK making a statement explanatory of the course he had pursued?

Mr. WHITE. I protest against the CLERK reading that document which lies on his table. I have no objection to his making a brief statement, confining himself to his reasons for the course taken by him.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, if there were any thing like concurrence in the views of gentlemen who supported those who came here with the certificate or commission of the Governor of New Jersey, the task of answering them would be much more simple and easy; but gentlemen had so many and such conflicting modes of attaining the same ulterior object, as at least to justify a suspicion that the object itself could not be a very defensible one. One seemed willing to trust the CLERK, and charged him with gross delinquency for not inscribing on his roll the names of Mr. YORKE and his associates. Other gentlemen seemed unwilling to trust him, and thought it best that we should pass over the contested seats until we got a quorum. To whom were the arguments, submitted by gentlemen, mainly addressed? Most of the speeches to which he had listened, had been addressed to the CLERK of the House; some severely arraigning his conduct, and others evidently designed to induce the CLERK to recede from the position he had taken. Now, did not common justice, he had almost said common decency, demand that the CLERK should have the opportunity of explaining? Why did gentlemen deny him this very reasonable privilege? Why were gentlemen here, in limine, so anxious to exclude the light? Was this in accordance with the principle that induced them to exclude the evidence that went to show that the certificate of the Governor was in truth and in fact no evidence of the expressed will of the soverign people of New Jersey, but that others actually received the majority? Had it come to this, that the voice of a majority of the people of a sovereign State was not only to be silenced by notes of mere form and technicality, but that a functionary who had taken a course that might, in its consequences, possibly give effect to that voice, was not to be allowed the opportunity of explaining and justifying his course, and that, too, after it had been animadverted upon in no sparing manner? He hoped his friend from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] would review the determination he had expressed, never to permit the CLERK to read the explanation he had proposed to submit to us. It was due to a functionary whom we held responsible for official action, and whose decision had been so severely criticised.

Mr. V. said he had already remarked, that most of the speeches had been addressed to the CLERK, to induce him to abandon the position he had taken. Suppose he refused to recede—and it was not to be presumed that he had announced his decision without due consideration—what course then remained to us, if he remained consistent, but that proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] His motion was, that we pass, for the present, over the contested New Jersey seats, call the residue of the members whose right to seats was not controverted; and then, having a quorum, we would be in a situation to decide, whether, before organization, all the claimants should stand back. No other alternative remained to us. If the CLERK did not inscribe the names of either set of the New Jersey claimants on his roll, we must, from the law of necessity, by general consent, pass the contested seats, and postpone further action upon them until we procured a quorum competent to act. He had heard a great deal about the law of necessity. He acknowledged its full force and obligation upon this occasion. But there was another law to which we were here, in the discharge of our high duties, amenable; he meant that law of courtesy and propriety which should ever govern our deliberations here. He viewed the good tone and temper with which the debate had thus far been conducted, as an ample pledge that nothing unbecoming the places we occupied would be attempted or uttered. To return, then, again to this universally respected law of necessity, he would ask whether it did not irresistibly drive us into the course suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.]

The CLERK had decided, that in the present stage of our proceedings, no question could be taken. And it must be so; for no roll having yet been called, and no quorum ascertained, any body would now have a right to vote. Could not each of the conflicting claimants from New Jersey claim and exercise the right of voting? What could prevent them? Why not vote as well as any other gentleman whose name had not yet been called? Here, then, we would exhibit the monstrosity of five more members voting within this bar, than the Constitution or the laws of Congress ever authorized to be elected to the House? We were then driven to the necessity, if our object were not disorganization, of passing over the contesting members, until the list of the undisputed members was completed, and thus secure a tribunal to look into their case.

[Here Mr. WISE asked Mr. V. to yield the floor, in order to ask him a question. Mr. V. said he would yield it for the purpose of explanation, but not to be catechised.]

And here he would ask, whether, after the roll was called, and before the Speaker was chosen, any efficient action could be had upon this subject matter. He had no doubt on the subject. We were a House competent to act upon it the moment the CLERK had finished calling the list of the members whose seats were not disputed. From the very necessity and fitness of things, a power resulted to us to act upon matters of this description in that stage of our existence. We were a "House" before the Speaker was chosen. The Constitution had created us such, by means of the expressed will of the sovereign people of our respective districts. Parliaments and Congresses existed long before Speakers. There was a sort of preliminary organization the moment the roll was called by the CLERK. And to sustain him in this position, he had very high authority, in a distinguished gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] whom he differed from in politics, but whom he always listened to with pleasure. He would bring to the aid of the gentleman from Vermont, who sat before him, [Mr. SLADE,] the powerful aid of his colleague. He would now read an extract from his [Mr. EVERETT'S] speech, which expressed his (Mr. V's) opinions with so much more force and perspicuity than he could express them, that he would adopt them as part of his argument. Mr. V. here read an extract from the speech of Mr. Everett, in the case of Claiborne and Gholson as reported in the National Intelligencer of the 6th September, 1837, as follows:

"Gentlemen were in error, in supposing that the House was under no law. There was a law which bound them, and that was the law of universal practice—the common law of Parliament. It was a mistake to suppose that the House was not organized until a Speaker was appointed. There was a preliminary organization, which enabled it to act as a body. As to the list called by the CLERK, he formed it according to usage, on what he deemed authentic information. He did so on his own responsibility. As soon as the list was completed, and the members had answered to their names, they formed an organized body, and might proceed to elect a Speaker, a Clerk, or a Committee of Elections, just as they thought best, or might at once proceed to decide on the credentials of individuals. In the present case, before the list had been gone through, those whose names had not yet been called had no right whatever to vote, any more than the surrounding spectators."

This doctrine, said Mr. V. so ably put forth by the gentleman from Vermont, must be true. What sad consequences might result if it were otherwise. Suppose the CLERK is convinced, by evidence before him, that the certificate produced by a pretending member is a forgery; and that in consequence of the sudden death of the Governor, or other certifying officer, the opposite party could not procure the genuine document. Is there so much magic in this prima facie evidence that the CLERK must passively enter his name upon the rolls, and permit the villain not only to defile these seats, but to participate with us in our incipient, most important acts and deliberations? Are we indeed so impotent a body as all this would imply? Must the poisoned fruit of fraud and villany not only be produced and reaped, but actually eaten, before we can interpose an effectual veto to the production and participation of it? He would resist, and resist in an orderly manner, of course, long and most lustily, to avert such consequences; for they would involve the guarantee, that the potential voice of the majority of the sovereign people of New Jersey was most culpably disobeyed.

How far he would consent to act upon cases of contested elections before the election of Speaker and the organization of the House, in the common acceptation of the term, was another question. But we could, in this case, act far enough to enable us to determine whether one or the other set of gentlemen were elected, or, at all events, whether there was so much doubt on the subject as that it would be expedient that both should stand back until a Speaker was chosen and a Committee of Elections appointed. As to these two sets of credentials, the trial upon which we would first enter was a trial of the record, and in order to this, nothing but an inspection of the record was necessary. The law of New Jersey declares "that the persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State, are the persons chosen by the people of New Jersey." Mind, sir, the law is emphatic; "the greatest number of votes from the whole State," not from part of the State, omitting the good old Democratic towns of Millville and South Amboy. The commission of the Governor, upon which Mr. YORKE and his associates rely, assumes the fact that they received the "greatest number of votes from the whole State." This is at least implied, if not expressed. The Governor then bases his commission upon a return of votes from the whole State—upon a record, purporting to show that the gentlemen whom he commissioned received the greatest number of votes. Their opponents come in and say there is no such record. You, Mr. Governor, based your certificate upon only part of the record. You remembered to forget that there were two such towns, named Milville and South Amboy, in the State; for you did not compute the votes of these towns. They adduce the actual return, or the evidence of the actual return, as filed in the Department of State, from which it appears that the record upon which the Governor has based his certificate, or commission, is partial and defective. It is not the true and genuine record. Would this not rebut the prima facie evidence of the certificate? Prima facie, sir! What was the good sense and nature of prima facie evidence? It was, that it stood good, until rebutted by other and higher evidence; but, according to the doctrine of gentlemen, it was not, in its nature, here prima facie, but conclusive—conclusive at least so far as to preclude a rebuttal until after the mischief was done; after the prima facie members had voted for Speaker, that high and responsible officer, who appoints your committees, the eyes and organs of the House. Prima facie evidence was, indeed, thus invested with new and unheard of characteristics.

It was said by some, that we could not open the whole door, and go into the whole case before a Speaker was chosen. Here was the distinction, and in stating it, he would indicate how far he thought we might go in this our embryo state. We were, perhaps, not in a condition to purge the polls, to go beyond the ballot boxes, into the consideration of evidence designed to show that votes were given by disqualified persons; for such an inquiry would involve the examination of voluminous, and, no doubt, conflicting testimony; and this could not well be done without a committee; but we were competent to look at the record, to look at the returns, and see whether there was such a record as that upon which the Governor bases his certificate. How feasible was our course after the roll was called, if we went only to the extent that his remarks would commit us; and this would be all that was necessary for the purpose of this case. This was a case sui generis. The distinction between this and the ordinary cases of contested elections, which were not entertained till after our complete organization, was, that here the question arose upon the return, not upon the merits, in the more enlarged sense of the word. The question was not, whether a majority was produced by the votes of disqualified voters, but whether the whole and true result of the votes actually given and returned to the Governor had been returned to us; and this being a point of easy ascertainment, no good reason could be assigned why we should not entertain the question, at least so far as to set mere pretenders aside till the House was completely organized.

These (said Mr. V.) were his views and answers to the technical points—the mere questions of form—raised here, to preclude us from looking at the real truth and justice of the case; but he was free to confess that he was impelled to, and fortified in, the course he took, by other and higher considerations than any to which he had yet adverted. It was, that his course favored popular liberty; that the right and truth and justice and conscience of the case were all against the pretenders who claimed seats here merely "BECAUSE OF THEIR BOND." He implored the House not to acknowledge itself so impotent, or so mystified by form, as to be blinded to substance; not to promulgate to the world that the potent voice and will of the people of a sovereign State, constitutionally expressed, could here be practically frustrated and drowned, even for a season, by the pitiful squeaking notes of form and technicality.

Mr. POPE observed that the doctrines advanced by the gentleman who had just resumed his seat, were more extraordinary than any he had ever heard before. What was it? Why, that the gentlemen coming here with the regular certificates of the Governor of a State, as members from that State, shall be driven from their seats, and others coming here on their own assumption, shall be allowed them. He confessed he was mortified at the course taken by several Whig members; he regretted that they should have consented to play into their opponents' hands, by admitting that it would be proper to pass by the names of the members from New Jersey, until a quorum was called. When he came here to take his seat, he found it difficult to get one, eleven seats having been already taken by the two sets of members from New Jersey, while that State was only entitled to six seats. Now, (said Mr. P.) before we proceed farther, we ought to make five of these gentlemen march off. To understand the position in which they were placed, it became necessary to inquire by what authority they were assembled here. They stood here by the authorities vested in them through the delegated authority of their States, whether they might be the Governor, sheriff, or judges of elections. That, said Mr. POPE, is the authority by which we are assembled here. There was a political law which regulated this matter. It was this—that when a sovereign State speaks through her constituted authorities, you are bound to give full faith and credit to them. We have all come here, Mr. P. said, with the authority granted to us by our respective States through their constitutional organs. The Constitution, it was true, for reasons which Mr. P. stated, reserved the power to this House to judge of the abuse of power by these constituted authorities; but until this House does so decide, the certificates given by these constituted authorities, are entitled to full faith and credit.

Mr. P. said that in contending for the authority of the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, he was only contending for the observance of established usage, and had no such ulterior objects in view as the election of a Speaker, as had been imputed to them. For his part, he would advise the Opposition in this House to let the Administration party have the Speaker at any rate, and take the responsibility of conducting the business of the body. He was for letting them show their hands, in order that they might judge of the game they were to play. But in reference to the question before them, he would beg the gentleman from New York to answer him one question. Was it competent for the State of New Jersey, or New York, or any other State, to designate the manner of holding elections, to appoint judges of elections, and to erect a tribunal to decide who is legally and constitutionally elected at such elections? If so, had not the State of New Jersey appointed such judges, constituted such a tribunal, and had not the authorities delegated by her for that purpose, certified with all the formalities of law, that the five gentlemen who have the commission of the Governor of that State, were legally elected? Mr. P. contended that these certificates must stand as valid, until this House, in the last resort, decided otherwise. He asked how the five gentlemen who claimed their seats in virtue of the certificate of the Secretary of State that they had the majority of the votes given, could present themselves here at this stage of the proceedings? All that, in his opinion, they could do, was to appeal to this House after it should be organized, or to the regularly constituted authorities of their State, to do them justice. Mr. P. said that he had been for a long time a member of the Legislature of Kentucky, and for a short time a member of that House; but in all his legislative experience, he had never known that the persons having the power of attorney—the regular certificate from the constituted authorities that they were elected, had ever been denied the right to their seat until this time. But gentlemen asked who were to vote on this question. He answered, all those members assembled here, who had the certificates from the regular constituted authorities of their State. He would ask by what arbitrary power could it be said that the State of New Jersey should be disfranchised, and her representatives deprived of their share in the organization of the House. Here was a question that must be settled before the House could proceed farther. We are assembled here, said Mr. P. not to play any trick of party with each other, by which we may gain a party advantage, but as honorable men, assembled from twenty-six States of this Union, all willing and anxious to preserve the rights of the others, and, therefore, bound to receive the authentic evidence presented by each individual. No gentleman had a right to call upon the others to recognise him as a brother member, unless he was furnished with the regular certificate from the constituted authorities of his State. Those whose claims were otherwise presented might, at a proper time, after the organization of the House, show that injustice had been done them; but until they did so, those only who had the regular certificates were entitled to the contested seats. It was unfortunate for the Whig party, Mr. P. said, that there seemed to be some disagreement among themselves. Some of them were willing that those members whose seats were not contested, should qualify, and thus make up a quorum competent to decide upon the others. This, to his mind, was wrong. We have (continued Mr. P.) neither the power to say that the five members from New Jersey shall not qualify, nor had they the power to admit eleven from that State. The only possible way of getting out of the difficulty in which they were involved, was to admit those gentlemen only who had the regular certificates of election.

Mr. RHETT confessed that this morning it was his impression, from old opinions that he had entertained on the subject, that the CLERK of the House had no right to put a question, and that they, as members of Congress, were not bound to answer him. But the House (Mr. R. said) had decided that it was competent for the CLERK to put a question. He would now read from the Journal of the House for the first session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, the proceedings in which this decision was made.

Here Mr. R. read as follows:

"Walter S. Franklin, Clerk to the late House of Representatives, commenced the call of the roll of members by States, beginning with the State of Maine; and having called as far as the State of Mississippi, and being about to call the members from that State—

Mr. Mercer, of Virginia, rose and moved the adoption of a resolution in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That sufficient evidence has not been afforded to this House that John F. H. Claiborne and Samuel J. Gholson are lawfully entitled to seats therein.

The said resolution was read; and, after debate thereon,

A motion was made by Mr. Bynum that it do lie on the table:

And after further debate, the question was put that the resolution do lie on the table,

And passed in the affirmative.

Mr. R. Barnwell Rhett then submitted the following motion, to wit:

That Lewis Williams, of North Carolina, being the oldest member of the House of Representatives, be appointed chairman of this House, to serve until the House be organized by the election of a Speaker.

A motion was made by Mr. Toucey, that the said motion do lie on the table; and, after debate, the question was put,

And passed in the affirmative.

And so the motion made by Mr. R. Barnwell Rhett was ordered to lie on the table."

Now, sir, continued Mr. R. at the opening of the last Congress, as many difficulties and objections as to your power occurred to me, as strongly as they had to-day occurred to any gentleman present. He was at a loss to see the power by which the CLERK was seated in that chair. It was under these objections that he made the motion he did to appoint a Chairman to serve until the House was organized. He made this motion because he could see no parallel between the situation of the CLERK and Clerk of the House of Commons of Great Britain.

Mr. R. here showed the distinction between the powers of the two officers. There was no analogy between their situations, because there was law to govern the one, and no law to govern the other. He could not, therefore, recognise the CLERK as having powers which might be dangerous for him to exercise. These were his impressions at the time, but the House overruled his motion, and decided that it was competent for the CLERK to put a question. This was not the only case in which the House made such a decision. At the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, the same rule was observed. Here Mr. R. read from the journal as follows:

"And a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number of members of the House, being present,

And the members being about to proceed to the election, by ballot, of a Speaker to preside over its deliberations,

A motion was made by Mr. PATTON that the Speaker be elected viva voce.

And after debate,

A motion was made by Mr. EVANS that the motion made by Mr. PATTON, that the election of Speaker be made viva voce, do lie on the table.

And on the question that the said motion do lie on the table,

It passed in the affirmative."

Thus it appeared, that however reasonable or unreasonable it might be, this House had already determined that they would proceed to business, with the CLERK in the Chair to put the questions; and the House had done so for two succeeding sessions. Mr. R. thought, therefore, that it would be best for the House to pursue the same course now, and suffer the question to be put, whether the CLERK should be permitted to make a statement explanatory of the course he had pursued.

Mr. WISE observed that the precedents cited by the gentleman from South Carolina, were very good ones in the cases in which they applied; but they did not, in his opinion, apply in this case. In the case of Claiborne and Gholson, there were no persons contesting their right to their seats. In this case no question had arisen as to who should or should not vote in organizing the House. Then in the other case—that where Mr. PATTON moved to vote viva voce for the election of Speaker—the question was simply taken by general consent; and there was no question as to who should vote, or any other questions like those now presented to the House. But now the first question was, whether you shall pass over the State of New Jersey? and then the question would arise, who should vote on it? These questions never could be decided unless by general consent, or by leaving it to the CLERK to count the votes, and then he would decide the very question he had referred to the House for its decision. Considering all these difficulties, he begged the CLERK, before it was too late, to recede from the decision he had made, and to proceed to call over the names of the members from the Sate of New Jersey. The CLERK might, if he pleased, call either of the two sets of members claiming to represent that State. He might call Mr. DICKERSON and his party, instead of Mr. AYCRIGG and his friends. All he wanted was for the CLERK to proceed with the case of the House, and he begged the CLERK to go on. He would make one suggestion to the gentleman from South Carolina, and that was that no question could be decided there by general consent, as it was in the cases he had cited. Mr. W. again drew the distinction between the case of Claiborne and Gholson, and the one now presented; and ended by declaring that their was no way of deciding the questions before them, but by the CLERK receding from the decision he had taken.

Mr. RHETT observed that they must determine one thing at a time; and he thought that the record he had just read was sufficient to show that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts could be put by the CLERK, in accordance with the settled rule of that body. The motion of that gentleman was, that the CLERK be permitted to make a statement, explanatory of the course he had taken. Now the House had, on two previous occasions, decided that it was competent for the Clerk to put such a question. The gentleman from Virginia was mistaken in saying that in the cases he had cited, the questions had been taken by general consent; for on both occasions there was a division, and a very strong minority. He thought that it would be better for them to take up one question at a time, and decide that, and then go on to the next one. If, however, the House should not proceed in this way, and the organization should be formed with members who were returned in sonsequence of fraud, and a Speaker should be elected in consequence of votes thus taken by fraud, he should take it upon himself as a member of Congress, if no other gentleman did, to move to have these frauds investigated, and the election of Speaker set aside as utterly null and void.

Mr. AYCRIGG, one of the gentlemen claiming seats from New Jersey, in virtue of the Governor's commission, rose, and addressing himself to the CLERK, said: I wish to know, sir, whether, at the time I called at your office with our credentials, you did not acknowledge that they were perfectly legal, and in the form that the credentials of members from New Jersey had always been presented.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee objected to the CLERK being called upon to give a partial statement, without being permitted to explain the whole case. The CLERK had heard his conduct called in question on all sides, and it was unfair to call on him to make so partial a statement.

Mr. GARLAND, the Clerk, then asked if he might be permitted to make a statement explanatory of his conduct.

Mr. AYCRIGG and several other gentlemen objected.

Mr. JENIFER addressed the House at great length, arguing that the CLERK was bound to consider the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey as the prima facie evidence of the election, and to call over the names of the gentlemen presented in them. By pursuing a contrary course, the CLERK had taken upon himself virtually to disfranchise the State of New Jersey, and to deprive her members of their rightful share in the organization of the House. He did not impugn the motives of the CLERK, for the little intercourse he had had with him, had been very much to his credit; but he believed that the CLERK had been influenced by the advice of his political friends, and he was anxious to relieve him from the difficulty in which they had involved him. There was, he knew, an ulterior object in view—the depriving five of the New Jersey members of their seats, was to be followed by ejecting one member from Pennsylvania; and by thus ousting six members, a majority might be obtained for the purpose of accomplishing the iniquitous ends of party. The election of the CLERK was also to come on, and his election was believed by his friends to depend upon the organization of the House. The CLERK himself never would have ventured to take the course he did, had he not been urged to it by his friends. Mr. J. appealed to the CLERK, and urged upon him to recede from his decision.

Mr. WELLER said the question presented to the consideration of that assembly, (for it could not yet be called a House,) it appeared to him, was a very singular one. The motives of the CLERK in omitting to call the Whig claimants from New Jersey had been impugned, and he had asked their permission to state the facts in the case, as shown by the papers filed in his office, and the reasons upon which he had acted. He was utterly astonished to find men on that floor denying this privilege to the CLERK. He would ask the gentlemen of the Opposition why it was that they were unwilling to have all the facts? Were they afraid to let the CLERK state to the House the facts upon which he was led to submit this question of right to the House? Do they fear that a full and fair exposition of the evidence will show that these "certificate gentlemen" are not entitled to their seats? For his own part, he wished to see the evidence in this case laid before this assembly, and before the country. Let the people see how the gentlemen in the Opposition had sought to trample upon their rights—how Governor Pennington and his Privy Council had attempted to place men in this Hall whom they had rejected. He said he understood that there was evidence on the CLERK's table, showing beyond a reasonable doubt that the Democratic claimants received a majority of the people's votes, and that the Governor and his Council had usurped the rights of the people by commissioning others. What was the duty of the CLERK, then, under these circumstances? Should he proceed to enrol, as members of this House, men who, so far from being sent here by the people, had been rejected by them? He apprehended not. He [the CLERK] was bound under the solemnities of his oath to pass them by, for it was impossible to decide who were entitled to the seats. Let both sets stand back until the House is organized, when a full and fair investigation could be had. Mr. W. said he was unwilling to take a seat alongside of those who, so far from coming here endorsed by the people, come here with a protest on their backs. He was unwilling that they should be permitted to vote on any question, until their right to seats here was determined.

But it had been said that they could not go behind the "certificate" of Governor Pennington, given under the "broad seal" of the State! Gentlemen appeared to attach some peculiar sanctity to seals! Were they not aware that there was an official document in the hands of the CLERK, under the "great seal" of the Secretary of State, showing that the Democratic claimants received a majority of the people's votes, as it appears by the records in his office? If they were ignorant of that fact, it was their own fault, for they had refused to hear the papers read. Shall we, he asked, suffer Governor Pennington, with his "great seal," to manufacture members for the people in direct opposition to their expressed wishes? He trusted not. He hoped, for the honor of this nation, that they would not suffer so gross an outrage to be perpetrated on the rights of the people.

Much had been said by gentlemen in the Opposition about "the liberties of the people, constitutional rights," &c. He had as high a regard for the liberties of the people as any man on that floor; and it was to prevent Governor Pennington and his clique from destroying those liberties that he now addressed them.

But, sir, (said Mr. W.) we are told that these certificates afford "prima facie" evidence that the claimants are entitled to the seats. This was not denied. It was prima facie evidence, but that evidence might be rebutted and destroyed by evidence of a higher character. Here, sir, we find upon the table of our CLERK, proof that those certificates had been given to men who received a minority of the popular vote. That evidence was abundant and conclusive. Let any man whose mind is not under the complete dominion of prejudice, examine it, and tell him whether there was yet evidence sufficent to warrant the CLERK of the House in placing these men in this Hall as members. Your "prima facie" evidence is rebutted by the most conclusive proof that the certificates are basely false. You may succeed, he said, in suppressing that evidence here, but the people of this country will have it, and they will do justice to this Whig Governor and his Privy Council.

Let the citizens of this Republic once understand all the facts in this case, and, his word for it, they would set the "great seal" of condemnation upon this high-handed outrage upon their rights. He said it was emphatically a contest between the Governor of New Jersey and his Privy Council on the one side, and the people on the other. Shall the people elect their Representatives, or shall Governor Pennington do it for them? That was the question submitted to their consideration.

Suppose, said Mr. W. there was proof that the certificates were false; he would ask whether they were now in a condition to pass upon that question? No: for the question, who was entitled to vote, would immediately arise, if a proposition be made to investigate it. They would then be compelled to decide upon the claims of these gentlemen to vote.

Mr. W. said he would ask what were these gentlemen depending upon to give them seats? Not the votes of the people, but the mere technicalities of the law, and the broad seal of the State, fraudulently made use of by Gov. Pennington. This was, as he before said, a contest between that Governor and the people of New Jersey; and are gentlemen willing to sacrifice the dearest rights of the people, and sustain the Governor in his usurpations? The people had as much right to have a vote in electing a Speaker of this House as to vote in the enactment of a law, and it was their solemn duty to decide whether the people or the Governor should be represented in the election of that officer. There was sufficient proof upon the CLERK's table that the Representatives of the people are entitled to vote upon this question, and not those of Gov. Pennington; that his certificates were untrue.

Mr. MAXWELL here rose and denied the assertion.

Mr. W. continued: He said he did not hear the gentleman; that he would be pleased to hear him, notwithstanding he came here without the authority of the people. He again reiterated that he was opposed to their voting for Speaker, and commended the CLERK for the course he had pursued, and contended that it was his duty to set aside the claims of those who came there with fraudulent certificates.

He said the principles advocated by the Federal party on this occasion, were in exact accordance with those which had governed that party from the first organization of the Government. They had always practised upon the principle of the incapacity of the people to govern themselves—that the minority should rule. That, he said, was the corner stone of Federalism. They believed that the great mass of their countrymen were too ignorant to govern themselves; and hence, in this case, they appear to contend that a Governor of a State, with his "great seal," was a better judge of who the people want to represent them, than the people themselves.

Mr. W. said he intended, upon all occasions, to cast his vote in favor of the individuals claiming seats, who had a majority of legal votes; and as one of the Representatives of the people, he could not consent to sit in that Hall with men who did not come there as their choice. His object was to do full and ample justice to these men and to the people of New Jersey, and he was not to be tied down by forms, or stand upon technicalities, when he saw a gross fraud practised upon the rights of the people of a sovereign State. Suppose, sir, he again said, that there were facts on the CLERK's table showing that these certificates were basely false? Were we to adhere so closely to technicalities that we cannot inquire into the matter, and examine the evidence? Are we to be precluded by th "great seal" of Governor Pennington? It did seem to him that common justice required none of these men should be seated until this question was settled. He had, he said, expressed his opinions freely, and perhaps with some warmth, on this subject. He had been accustomed all his life to express his opinions freely. He had exercised that right at home, and no earthly consideration should deter him from exercising it here. And whenever he saw an effort made to disregard the expressed will of the people, and trampled upon their constitutional rights, he would be heard in their defence. Yes, sir, said he, as long as God gives me a voice to speak, that voice shall be heard in vindicating the cause of an outraged and insulted people.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON thought that the House must pursue the course usual on such occasions, or they never could organize. The usage established, and which had never been departed from, was, that when gentlemen presented themselves, with the certificate of the Governor, under the great seal of the State, they were entitled to participate in the organization of the House. He thought it would be dangerous to depart from the long established usage on the subject, and he conjured gentlemen to weigh well the consequences of such a course. If the State of New Jersey was not called, a sovereign State would not be represented in the important—and, in the present condition of the country, all important—election of Speaker. This matter might be carried further. Suppose he, from a captious or vexatious spirit, should contest the right of a member from the State of New York, or the State of Ohio, or from any other State, the same difficulty as in the present case would recur, and an organization of the House would never be effected. He had not intimated his opinion of the merits of the claimants on either side of this question; he had purposely abstained from doing so; but he pledged himself—if such a pledge would not be considered disrespectful to the House—when it came up regularly before them, to investigate it, and decide upon it, with the strictest impartiality.

Mr. DUNCAN attempted to obtain the floor; but

The CLERK deciding in favor of Mr. RANDOLPH,

Mr. DUNCAN inquired if that gentleman had had not already participated in the debate?

The CLERK said that, in the present condition of the House, he did not consider the parliamentary rule, that no member should speak more than twice on the same dubject, to be in force.

Mr. RANDOLPH then said that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] had asserted that there were certificates for two sets of members from the State of New Jersey. Before he did this, he should have understood something of the laws of that State. His colleagues and himself came there as the Representatives of the State of New Jersey, certified in all the forms of the laws of that State, and no other form of certificate was legal or valid. They came there with the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, under the broad seal of the State—a seal, the validity of which was never questioned until the present. This time-honored seal was older than the Constitution of the United States. It was adopted when her soil was trodden by a foreign foot, when the blood of Jerseymen was poured out as water, when her villages were given to the flames, and her fields devastated, then had she adopted this seal, and imprinted on it the emblems of the fruitfulness of her soil and the devotion of her sons to the principles of liberty. And never till the present time had the sanctity and validity of that seal been questioned. Another remark of the gentleman from Ohio was, that the CLERK was not permitted to give his reasons for the course he had pursued. He appealed to gentlemen all around if he had not yesterday requested that the CLERK should be heard. In justice to that gentleman, and to his colleagues, he requested that the reasons of the CLERK should be heard. But the gentleman from Ohio had said this was a contest between the Governor and the people of New Jersey. Sir, the Governor of New Jersey is the organ of the people of New Jersey. His conduct has been submitted to their scrutiny, and all the powers of earth have been called into requisition to hurl him from his station; yet he is still their organ. Efforts have been made to blacken his character with infamy, but he was much mistaken if, before this investigation was closed, he would not appear to have acted in strict conformity to legal provisions, and the dictates of conscience.

Mr. DUNCAN obtaining the floor,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment.

The motion appearing to be seconded by a large number of voices, the CLERK was about to announce the adjournment, when

Mr. CUSHING objected to any adjournment, without a vote being taken.

The CLERK was under the impression that he could not put a question to a voie of the House.

Mr. CRAIG understood that the House consented that the CLERK should put the question.

The CLERK still thought, as there was not a quorum, he could not put a question.

Mr. MERCER said if there were but ten members present, motions of adjournment could be made and acted on.

Mr. CUSHING referred to the First Congress, when there was no quorum present for three weeks, and they had adjourned from day to day, until a quorum had assembled.

Mr. WISE hoped they would have a vote on the question of adjournment. If they could take a vote on that question, they could on another, and he would as soon have the matter settled in that way as in any other.

Mr. CRAIG said that in the present unorganized state of the body, all must perceive that every movement must be the result of general consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then moved that the House adjourn until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

The CLERK then put the question on the adjournment, and it was decided in the affirmative; and then,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1839.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut appeared in his seat this morning.

Mr. BENTON said, that though, in consequence of the other department of the Legislature not being organized, it would not be proper to transact legislative business, yet he considered there would be no impropriety in taking some initiatory steps towards procuring information as a basis of future legislative action. He would therefore submit some resolutions of inquiry, if the CHAIR decided that it would be in order.

The CHAIR deciding that it would be in order,

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the records, and of all the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, and also of the Court Martial lately held at St. Louis, on Lt. Col. Brant; also the copy of his resignation; and, also, of all the papers connected therewith.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate as follows:

1. The articles of foreign import, which being manufactured into a different article in the United States, are allowed a drawback of duty on being exported; with the quantities and values of such imports and exports, and the amounts of duties received and drawback paid on the same, from the year 1833, inclusive, to the end of the fiscal year of 1839.

2. The amount of drawback which would have been payable on such exportations, if the act of March 3, 1839, for the reduction of duties, commonly called the Compromise act, had provided for a reduction of drawback in proportion to the periodical reduction of duty.

3. The probable quantities and values of such imports and exports, and the amounts of duties receivable, and of drawbacks payable thereon, from the year 1840, inclusive of that year, to the consummation of the Compromise act, in 1842, and for one year thereafter; provided the said act remains as it is.

4. The same quantities, values and duties for the same time, with the annual amounts of drawback, which would be payable if the drawback underwent reductions proportionately with the reductions of duty.

5. A table of recapitulation and comparison, showing the annual difference, and the aggregate difference between the amounts of drawback paid and payable under said act, from 1833 inclusive to 1842, and one year thereafter, if the act remains as it is, and the amounts that would have been paid and should become payable hereafter, if the drawbacks had been subject to reduction in proportion to the reduction of duties from the date of the act.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, so far as it may be in the power of the Treasury Department to obtain the information, the names of all the banks in the United States which may have stopped specie payments during the suspension of 1839; also of those which did not stop; noting those which may have recommenced payments; the whole divided into classes by States and Territories, and the District of Columbia.

Also, that he cause to be communicated to the Senate the names of all banks, if any, which have refused to pay the Government demands, Post Office inclusive, in specie when demanded; with all the circumstances of such failure, and the correspondence to which it led.

Also, to inform the Senate whether any of the Departments have information, or have reason to believe, that any of the Government creditors have been paid in depreciated currency since the general resumption of 1838.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate all the information which may be in his power or possession relative to the imposition of tolls and the annual amounts collected, on all sorts of vessels, empty, light, or heavily laden, on the Louisville and Portland canal, from the opening of the same to the present time; and the general expenses attending the canal. Also, the annual amount of dividends belonging to the United States. Also, the number of shares held in said canal stock by the United States, and the amount paid upon them. Also, the number of vessels of all kinds which have passed the said canal annually since it was opened. Also, whether the said canal is completely finished and put into a condition to pass vessels through in the shortest time practicable.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to address proper queries to the surveyor of the port at Louisville, and also at St. Louis, to be answered by themselves, and also to be communicated to the steamboat captains generally, in relation to the effect of the tolls on the said canal, and the amount thereof on their respective vessels for each time they pass through, and the aggregate amount for the season, or a year; and the comparative amount of the tolls paid to the canal, and the profits cleared by the boat; with an estimate of the amount of tolls which a regular trader of a given tonnage, between St. Louis and Louisville, and between New Orleans and Louisville, would poy in the number of years that such steamer would last, supposing her to continue in the same trade as long as fit for service; also a comparative estimate of such aggregate tolls, with the original cost of the vessel; and a further comparative estimate of such tolls, with the other expenses incident to the running of the steamboat.

Mr. CRITTENDEN gave notice that he would ask leave, at the earliest day it would be proper to do so, to bring in a bill to authorize the purchase of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal by the United States.

Mr. WALKER gave notice that he would ask leave, at the earliest day it would be proper to do so, to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill to provide for a standing and permanent pre-emption system, with sales, also, to actual settlers at reduced prices.

2. A bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the two per cent. fund arising under her compact for admission into the Union.

3. A bill to cede to the State of Mississippi a quantity of public land equal to that heretofore granted to the State of Ohio for the purposes of internal improvement.

4. A bill to authorize the substitution of other lands in place of school sections which are useless or unproductive.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama gave notice that he would ask leave, at the earliest day it would be in order to do so, to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

2. A bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road, or roads, leading to said State.

3. A bill to establish an additional land district in the State of Alabama.

4. A bill for the relief of certain persons therein named.

5. A bill for the relief of John McCartney.

6. A bill for the relief of Captain Snodgrass's company of Alabama volunteers.

7. A bill for the discontinuance of the office of Surveyor General in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and to abolish the office of Solicitor of the General Land Office.

8. A bill for the relief of Richard Robertson.

9. A bill for the relief of the assignees of Louis Baron De Ferriet.

10. A bill for the benefit of the Gainesville and Narkeeta Railroad Company.

11. A bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation in the State of Alabama.

12. A bill for the relief of the heirs of Colin Bishop.

13. A bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company.

14. A bill authorizing the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections granted for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu thereof.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that, at the earliest day it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill granting to the State of Michigan a quantity of land, to aid said State in the construction of a canal around the falls of St. Marie.

2. A bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan militia.

3. A bill making grants of public lands to certain States, for purposes of internal improvement.

4. A joint resolution, authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, Mr. GARLAND (the CLERK) called the House to order, and stated that, at the adjournment yesterday, Mr. DUNCAN of Ohio had the floor.

Mr. WISE then rose and stated, that if the gentleman from Ohio would yield the floor, he would submit a resolution which would, perhaps, settle the difficulty in which the House was now involved.

Mr. DUNCAN yielded the floor, when—

Mr. WISE then stated that he held in his hand a resolution, which had been prepared by one of his colleagues, who was not then in the House, which would perhaps relieve the House from its present difficulty. Mr. W. then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Representatives of the Congress of the United States now assembled, to relieve themselves from the embarrassment and difficulties which at present obstruct the organization of the House, will proceed, by the Acting Clerk, to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested; and, after the names of such members are all called, and before they proceed to elect a Speaker or other officer, or to organize in any manner, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, hear and decide upon all credentials, certificates, or commissions of persons claiming seats in the House of Representatives under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the respective States.

Mr. DROMGOOLE hoped it would be the general disposition of the members to adopt the proposition of his colleague, [Mr. WISE.] He was glad that it had been submitted. It appeared to him to cover the very ground maintained by himself and others from the beginning of this discussion, that it is competent for the House to decide the matter in dispute at the threshold. He understood that it had been contemplated to decide this contest forthwith; that as soon as the CLERK had called and enrolled the members whose seats were undisputed, that they would proceed immediately, before the transaction of any other business, to the investigation and decision of the conflicting claims to seats. Such had been his understanding, and for himself, he had been ready to give a pledge that he would unite in effectuating this purpose before he would join in any attempt to elect the Speaker or other officers.

This resolution of his colleague will effect this object. The disputed seats must be decided by those whose claims are uncontroverted. Their right and power to do this, is as complete before as after the election of Speaker. It may be inconvenient and difficult to act without a complete organization; but this inconvenience and difficulty does not destroy or impair the constitutional right of the House to judge of the election, qualification, and returns of members. The power of judging is conferred by the Constitution, and if it does not exist in the first instance, surely the election of Speaker and other officers cannot confer additional powers. The election of these officers is only for the purpose of promoting the convenience and order of our action, and for facilitating the despatch of business. He repeated that he hoped, for the sake of obviating all difficulty, the proposition of his honorable colleague [Mr. WISE] would be received by general consent.

Mr. WISE said that he was willing to trust to the consciences of gentlemen to decide this question of prima facie evidence, if the pledge was given that it should be decided before a Speaker or any other officer was elected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee said, that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, with a slight modification, accorded entirely with his views and wishes, and with the views of his friends, so far as he had conversed with them upon the subject. The resolution proposed to progress with the call of the members whose seats were undisputed, until the States were called through, and then, without a further organization of the House, to decide the rights of the several claimants; so that in the election of the officers of the House each State might be fully represented. This, in his opinion, was all right; but how was this trial to be made? We have no officers to preside over the deliberations of the House; we have no rules or regulations by which the debate is to be conducted; we have no means of ending debate, and he apprehended, if the resolution was adopted, that so soon as we entered upon the examination of the cases from New Jersey, an interminable debate of some kind would arise, and weeks would elapse, when we should find ourselves no nearer the object we all desire, than we are at present. He therefore suggested to the member from Virginia the propriety of so amending the resolution, as to make the rules and regulations which have heretofore controlled the action of Congress, the law of this House until it was organized.

Mr. J. said he had but one object in view—to have these disputed questions fairly decided by a majority of the members of the House, and he was perfectly willing that it might be done before the election of the officers of this House.

Mr. WISE hoped that the gentleman from Tennessee would take this resolution as it stood, and then he could move to adopt rules afterwards.

Mr. HUNT then submitted the following as a substitute for the resolution submitted by Mr. WISE:

Resolved, That the House will now proceed to elect a temporary Speaker, allowing the members from New Jersey (producing the evidence given according to the law of that State) to vote on the question; that the Speaker thus chosen shall appoint none of the committees of the House; that the Committee of Elections shall be chosen by ballot; and that, after the question on the disputed seats shall have been settled by the House, we will then proceed to choose a Speaker for the 26th Congress.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said the House was just as competent to adopt rules to govern its action after this resolution was adopted, as it was to adopt this resolution. Then let the House adopt this, and that will be one step in the business.

Mr. RIVES was pleased that his colleague had submitted the proposition before the House, and he would go for it, if the latter part of it was somewhat modified. It might turn out that it would be necessary to refer the subject to the Committee of Elections, and it seemed to him that some difficulty might arise in relation to that matter, if the resolution was adopted as proposed. He would be in favor of deciding in the first instance, as to the formality of the returns, but he thought it would not be proper for the House to decide as to who were entitled to seats, until the House was organized, and the matter was sent to a Committee of Elections, and decided upon in the usual way.

Mr. HOFFMAN agreed with the gentleman who last spoke, that the House would find it necessary to send the question to a Committee of Elections; and before that was done, they must proceed to the election of a Speaker, and go through with the organization of the House; but he contended that the five New Jersey members who held the Governor's certificate, were entitled to participate in the organization of the House. If this body refused them this privilege, it nullified the acts of a sovereign State. All usage and precedent, he argued, gave them the right to participate in the organization, and no body of men had the power to deprive them of this right. On yesterday, and the day before, the CLERK had decided that the House could not entertain an ordinary motion, and that no question could be put; yet it was now attempted to pass a resolution which would disfranchise a sovereign State. He looked upon this as a most extraordinary proceeding. It was the most odious nullification ever presented to the contemplation of the people of this country. The New Jersey members were as much entitled to their seats as any men who presented themselves in this body. There could be but one safe rule in this matter; and that was, he who holds he certificate, be it right or be it wrong, is entitled to the the seat until the House is properly organized. After that, justice can be done, if it has not been done in the first instance. He would ask gentlemen whether, in case these gentlemen were not legally entitled to their seats, and their votes elected a Speaker of one party, they might not remove them and elect a new Speaker. They might do this or do any thing else, rather than establish the monstrous precedent that the certificate of a Governor and Council was to be disregarded in the first instance.

Mr. GRAVES then submitted the following, as a substitute for both the resolutions before the body:

Resolved, That the acting Clerk of the House shall proceed with the call of the members from the different States of the Union, in the usual way, calling the names of such members from New Jersey as hold the regular and legal commissions from the Executive of that State.

Mr. GRAVES spoke at considerable length, contending that the members from New Jersey, who held the Governor's certificate, were entitled to their seats, and it was not in the power of this body to prevent them from taking them. He had no idea that they should be excluded because five loafers might see proper to come there and claim their seats. If the doctrine was assented to, which some gentlemen in the House held, the organization of the House might be prevented entirely, by persons from different States coming forward on the first day of the session and contesting the seats of a majority of the members of the House. This case might occur as readily as the one which had occurred. He pronounced the doctrine held by the CLERK, a revolutionary doctrine, and declared that the CLERK had been compelled to advance and maintain this doctrine by certain members of the House, in order that his re-election might be secured. Mr. G. replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr WELLER,] and proclaimed that it was a base slander, for that gentleman to declare that the party with which he acted had ever held the doctrine that the majority of the people ought not to rule. He contended, also, that it was a direct attack on State sovereignty for the CLERK or the House at present to refuse to admit men to seats, who had certificates under the broad seal of the State of New Jersey, and appealed to South Carolina State Rights men to give their views on this subject, and repudiate the doctrine advanced by the CLERK.

[Mr. WELLER made several ineffectual attempts to gain the floor to reply to the remarks of Mr. GRAVES.]

Mr. CRAIG regretted exceedingly that any thing should have occurred to create such a feeling between gentlemen on the floor, as seemed to be exhibited at present. Although we might differ on political questions, he saw no reason why there should be any personal bad feeling existing between gentlemen. Round assertions and imputations of motives carried no weight with them, and the only effect which could result from such a course of debate, would be to arouse the angry passions of gentlemen on this floor, where the utmost good feeling ought always to prevail. In reply to the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, he contended that the course pursued by the CLERK was not revolutionary, and that the adoption of the resolution of his colleague would be a proper course for the House to pursue. The gentleman from Kentucky had said, that the moment it was shown that the Whig members from New Jersey had not received a majority of the legal votes of that State, he would vote to exclude them. Then, if the gentleman held those views, he ought to vote for this resolution, because, if it was adopted, we might go behind the returns and ascertain who had received the greatest number of votes. If he believed that the gentlemen who had not the Governor's certificate had received a majority of the legal votes of the people of New Jersey, he was bound in conscience to sustain them; and with a view of obtaining some information on this subject, he would ask of the gentleman from New Jersey before him, if it was not a fact that the votes of the people of the district of South Amboy and Millville had been excluded from the general return?

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and stated that the votes of the people of these two districts were rejected because, in one instance, the judges of election had received a large number of the votes of aliens, and in the other case, they were rejected because they had not complied with the statute of the State.

Mr. CRAIG said it did not matter; the votes had been rejected, and in consequence of their being rejected from the general return, the gentlemen who were the political friends of the gentleman from Kentucky, claimed a seat. If they had not been rejected, the gentlemen on the other side would have had a majority of votes, and we hold that they, having the majority of votes cast, have the prima facie evidence of right to seats on this floor. He could not be bound by the great seal of the State of New Jersey, and vote for members to take seats, when his conscience told him that they were not entitled to those seats. All he desired, was, that the gentlemen who had the majority of legal votes of the State of New Jersey should have the seats. With regard to State sovereignty, which had been so much spoken of, he would say that he had the highest regard for it. But when he spoke of the sovereignty of a State, he did not mean that there was no difference between the people who constituted the State in this country, and the Governor and Council. In this country the people constituted the State.

With regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, he could not like it, because it called upon him and his friends to cancel the whole ground, and admit men to seats, who, in their opinion, were not entitled to them. His object was to exclude all the members from New Jersey of both parties, and then to act upon the question after the roll had been called through.

Mr. PICKENS said he regretted exceedingly the progress of this discussion, and particularly the excitement growing out of it, and it seemed to him that there was no cause for it? As to the threats alluded to, either out of the House, or on this floor, he knew nothing of them and cared less; born insensible to fear, he was prepared to meet the issue as it might arise, and do his duty to the country. He considered much of the matter thrown into the discussion this morning as irrelevant and unconnected with the subject.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had presented a distinct and definite proposition, and in writing, and in his (Mr. P's) judgment it was a reasonable proposition. He had said at the very commencement of the debate that this was an unobjectionable proposition. It was in effect the very motion made by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] on a former day; and as to the doubts suggested in regard to the latter part of the resolution, he for one was unwilling to express them. He was willing to meet the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] in fairness and candor, and he could not believe that that gentleman intended to play a miserable trick upon the House. He knew the gentleman would not do so. In his judgment, the case might be stated in this way. When the CLERK progresses, and calls through the roll of undisputed members, you will then have a quorum competent to decide the preliminary question. The House has the right to decide now, or then, and the preliminary question which will be presented to it, is, as to who has in his possession the legal returns from the State of New Jersey. The one side may say that the certificate of the Governor was the only full, legal, and prima facie evidence, and the other side may say that the majority of the freemen of New Jersey who had sent here another set of Representatives, had presented a prima facie case in full. Well, was he to say that one set of gentlemen were madmen and fools, because they chose to take one statement as prima facie evidence, in preference to another? What is prima facie evidence? Absolutely nothing, if it is fairly rebutted by other prima facie evidence; and the tribunal constituted to judge, is to decide which is the best testimony. We are constituted under the Constitution the supreme tribunal to judge in the matter. Under the Constitution, it belongs to us to decide on the qualifications, returns, and elections, of members to this House. There is no appellant jurisdiction; and one side may say that the testimony presented by one set of members is to them prima facie evidence, and the other side may say that the testimony presented by the other set is prima facie evidence for them. We are created by the Constitution quo ad oc the judicial tribunal, and there is and can be no other. But the practical question is, can we decide? A gentleman has proposed that we go on and organize the House. You can either decide on that question, or you can go, if you choose, into the merits of the question. The reason why the House has heretofore preferred an organization by the election of a Speaker, and the appointment of committees, is from mere expediency. But it belongs to the House, as a matter of right, to go directly into the merits of the question, and look behind the prima facie evidence without the interposition of a usual committee if they choose. If the House choose to decide as to the returns first, they can do so, and if it choose to decide on the merits of the election, it can do so. The only practical question was the one presented by the gentleman from Virginia; and he thought it so reasonable, that he thought gentlemen on all sides should unite upon it. Gentlemen ought to come here prepared to meet each other in confidence and liberality. He saw no reason for witholding confidence unless he was first betrayed; and when once betrayed he never placed confidence again in the men who betrayed him; but he knew that the gentleman who offered this resolution never intended to play a trick on the House. When he spoke of this resolution, it might be supposed by some gentlemen, that he had seen it before it was presented here; but he assured gentlemen that he had never seen it, or heard it read, until it was read from the CLERK's table. It was, however, precisely the motion of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. RIVES,] excepting some little particularity as to the mode of proceeding at the close of it.

He wished now to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, in regard to State sovereignty. When those questions come up to be decided, he would be prepared to decide them, but he would say at present that, according to his own ideas, State sovereignty was not in the keeping of a Governor and Council, or under a great seal. It was in the keeping of the people. It was properly in their keeping, and when they speak through a convention, then they speak the sovereignty of the State, and not till then. The Governor's seal and certificate are evidence of State authority, but are not exclusive evidence of sovereignty. We hold that sovereignty is in the keeping of the people themselves, and they alone have the right to declare their sovereignty when they meet in convention; but, sir, sovereignty does not belong to State Legislatures or Governors of States. Give him the legal evidence that such was the authority of New Jersey or of South Carolina, properly presented, and when the question properly arose, he would vote upon it. But he held that the House, if they chose, had the whole matter under their adjudication, and could not only decide upon the returns, but could go directly into the merits of the question, if they thought it expedient.

He would here say, without expressing an opinion as to the evidence, as he had not examined it, that although he was not prepared to say on all occasions vox Populi must be vox Dei, yet he was not ready to run counter to the express voice of the people of a State, if it was legally shown to him to be their voice. He called upon gentlemen to beware how they set at defiance the will of the people, when clearly expressed. He did not desire to preach revolutionary doctrine, but he was ready to declare a great truth, that history would bear him out in, which was, that the thunder of Heaven might sometimes be heard to roll in the indignant murmurs of an outraged, but free people.

As to who had the legal returns, he was not prepared to say at present. When that question arose, he thought there would be no difficulty in deciding it; but he would assure gentlemen, that by technicalities they could never smother up the great question as to who were here the representatives of a majority of the legal voters of New Jersey. When the people come to decide upon that question, they will tear off, and trample in the dust, the technicalities of special county court pleading, which are thrown around us here for party purposes, or otherwise.

He trusted that the good sense of the House would induce them to adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. Then we may adopt rules for our government, or do any other act which may be necessary in the decision of the case. With regard to the idea that the reading of the roll entitled a member to his seat, he would say a word. The CLERK calling the roll did not entitle him to his seat. He had not presented his credentials, and the CLERK had no right to demand that he should do so. They can only be demanded by the House, and he had no right to go forward to lay his certificate on that table until it was demanded of him by the House. He would scorn to present his credentials before any tribunal save the House itself, or at the Speaker's desk, as the organ of the House. He was a member without going before the CLERK or on the roll, and acknowledged nothing but the House as a tribunal to judge or decide. We were members without the oath, and could take it at any period when the House chose. The Constitution made us such, with power to elect a Speaker, and to judge of the returns, qualifications, &c. of our members, it then directed an oath, but not the time. As a question of mere right, the whole matter was under our jurisdiction, but as to the expediency of exercising our right and power before full organization, that was a question of expediency merely.

Mr. BARNARD observed that he had listened with the most profound attention to the discussion which had been going on for the last two or three days, without attempting to take any part in it. He had not ventured to express his own views on the subject, nor had he even ventured to make up a final opinion on it before he had heard, and attentively weighed, the opinions of other gentlemen. But, having heard the opinions of others, he was now prepared to make known the conclusions to which his mind had arrived, and he was prepared to act as a member of Congress in accordance with these conclusions. With the permission of the House, he would now proceed to make known his views on the subject before them, and if they should seem as reasonable to others as they appeared to be to him, he indulged the hope that some mode of relieving the House from the difficulty in which it would seem to be involved, would be adopted. He had but one word to say with regard to the CLERK of that House, and the position he was placed in. That functionary was elected by the last House of Representatives, which expired as an organized body on the 3d of March last. From that day, its being as an organized legislative body ceased; it was dissolved; it was resolved into its original elements; and those elements could never be gathered and compacted again, so as to form a body in form and shape as that was. But if the existence of that body ceased with the termination of the period for which it was created, it was not the same case with the existence of the CLERK. No, sir; that functionary had something more of life in him. He was recognised by the Contitution and the law; an officer of the law, on whom the law imposed certain duties to be performed, as well after the existence of the House as an organized body, as while it was in being. That functionary was not only CLERK of the last House of Representatives, but he was still CLERK of this, and would continue so until his successor should be appointed. It was a cardinal principle of the common law, that the public interests shall never be permitted to suffer for want of an incumbent to fill important offices; and in all such cases, by the common law of the country from which we derive most of our institutions, as well the common as the parliamentary law, every functionary holds over—to use a legal phrase—till his successor be appointed. Now it was in analogy to the rule of the common law, that the parliamentary rule was adopted that the CLERK of the House of Commons holds over until his successor is appointed. This was the settled parliamentary rule in England as well as in this country. He regarded, therefore, the CLERK, in assuming his seat and calling the House to order, as having done nothing more than he was fully warranted in doing both by law and usage; and further, he regarded the CLERK, in the position he thus occupies, as having his powers necessarily enlarged in consequence of the want of a Speaker: so enlarged that he is competent to enrol members' names, call over the names of members, and to put any question which the House can lawfully decide; to put questions of adjournment, and questions on the election of Speaker, and in short any other questions which the House, in its partially organized state of existence, can entertain. So much for the powers of the CLERK. Now as to his duties. We have assembled here, a large number of gentlemen claiming the rights and privileges which belong to representatives of the people in Congress. We have assembled here on the day appointed by law for the meeting of the Twenty-sixth Congress; and we have assembled in this hall, which is the place appointed for our meeting. Every man who has taken his seat on this floor claims to have done so with the character, privileges, and rights of a Representative of the Congress of the United States. Now, having thus assembled, the CLERK assumed his appropriate duties. He, at the proper hour, commenced calling over the roll of the House of Representatives according to law and according to usage—not according to usage merely, but also in accordance with parliamentary law. By the rule of convenience merely, he proceeded to call over the roll by States, beginning with the members from the State of Maine, and went on till he came to the State of New Jersey, when his progress was arrested by this means. After the CLERK had called as far as one of the Representatives from New Jersey, he proposed to the House to pass over the names of the remaining members from that State until he had called the rest of the roll over; and for what purpose? Why, sir, as I think was sufficiently explained by the CLERK, to enable us to form a quorum of undisputed members. Now why, I ask, (said Mr. B.) shall we pass by the State of New Jersey with that object in view? And, as he understood the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] it was precisely in accordance and in affirmance of the position assumed by the CLERK. He would ask gentlemen to pause and reflect if this did not assume certain important things; if it did not assume that questions might arise in the course of the organization of this House, for which it might be necessary to have a quorum of undisputed members to vote?

Now he (Mr. B.) assumed, and he asked gentlemen to listen to him while he explained the grounds of his assumption, that no question had arisen, which the House was called upon to pass, and that no question could arise which it was competent for it to decide. If this assumption was correct, he would ask why were they arrested in the midst of the organization of the House? The CLERK had told them that he wanted a quorum, and gentlemen on that floor had told them the same thing. Why (asked Mr. B.) do you want a quorum? For what purpose? What question was before the House, which it was called on to pass in review; or what question was likely to come before it which it was competent for it to decide? It had been said, in the first place, that when they came to the State of New Jersey, there were certain returns, or, more properly speaking, commissions, which the House would be called upon to review. If so, then was he mistaken in the judgment he had formed. Did not the CLERK present to the House one of the members from New Jersey, holding a commission precisely similar to those held by the five gentlemen he refused to call? Had any gentleman on that floor doubted the validity or authenticity of these commissions? Was it not conceded on all hands that these commissions were in the proper form? Were they not in conformity with the laws of New Jersey both as to form and substance? And what question, he asked, in regard to these commissions, was to be passed on by the House? Why, sir, (said Mr. B.) an honorable member, at an early stage of the debate, called for the reading of the law of New Jersey on the subject of elections. Why read that law? Certainly not for the information of the honorable gentleman who called for it, for he was well acquainted with the law. Certainly not for the information of any gentleman present, for no man had ventured to state that these commissions were not in strict conformity with the law, letter for letter, word for word, and comma for comma. He begged gentlemen to reflect on these things. Then (said Mr. B.) we want no quorum of ascertained members for the purpose of passing upon the validity of these commissions. They were admitted to be what the law required, and that was sufficient, so far as they were concerned. But they had been informed by the CLERK that he was in possession of certain other papers, showing that certain persons other than the five gentlemen who held the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey, claimed seats in the House of Representatives as Representatives from the State of New Jersey. Now, with regard to these papers, whatever they might be, I put (said Mr. B.) this question solemnly to the House—"Is there any question in relation to these papers to be passed upon by the House?" Had any gentleman stated that these papers were in conformity with the laws of New Jersey? The House could admit but six members from New Jersey, and these had presented themselves with the regular legal commissions from the constituted authorities of the State, which lie on your table. Were there any more? The CLERK had intimated no such thing. No gentleman had stated that he regarded the other set of papers as the regular legal evidence of membership, according to the laws of New Jersey. Then what question was there here to pass on? He admitted that it would be competent for the House to entertain a question between two conflicting returns from the same State, but he maintained that there were no conflicting returns from the State of New Jersey; for the papers presented by the gentlemen contesting the seats of the gentlemen bearing the Governor's commission were not returns, in the proper sense of the term. He would ask either of the honorable gentlemen who appeared here, bringing with them these papers, whether they had ever, for a moment, from the time of their receiving them to this, regarded themselves as existing members of Congress from the State of New Jersey? He would ask them if they had claimed privilege from arrest in virtue of having these papers? If they had done so, then he, Mr. B. had only to say to those gentlemen that they had claimed a character, rights, and privileges which belonged no more to them than to any other citizen of the United States. But could any man doubt for a moment that, with the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey on the CLERK's table, those gentlemen holding them could claim all the rights and privileges which the Constitution gave to members of Congress? Suppose either of these gentlemen had been arrested on his way to the Capitol, did any man doubt that, with the commission of the Governor of New Jersey, attested by the broad seal of the State in his hands, and with the provision of the Constitution requiring that full faith and credit should be given to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every State of this Union, his claims to be considered as a member of Congress would be respected by every court of justice in the Union? Could any question be raised here as to the regularity of these returns, whether they are, or are not, conformable to the laws of New Jersey? Was there a man who had any doubts on this point? The question did not arise on the regularity of either of the conflicting returns; for in the one case the regularity was admitted by universal consent, and in the other case the irregularity was conceded also by universal consent.

He, Mr. B. did not claim to have much experience on matters of Government or matters of law; but it had struck him with much surprise that gentlemen of legislative experience, should contend that this House, previous to its organization, could undertake to decide how the popular vote of New Jersey was given. The House in its present partially organized State, was incompetent to entertain any question of the kind—nor could it act on the subject at all any further than to ascertain who held the regular and legal commissions from the constituted authorities of the State. The House could not appoint its officers, its Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and door-keepers, nor elect its committees, until after its organization by the election of a Speaker. Neither could it do any act in its judicial character. It could not arrest its members for breach of order, nor entertain an impeachment, nor summon witnesses; and least of all, could it decide in a case of contested election—the most tremendous power it could exercise. He could not see how the committees can be appointed until after the organization. The House would possess no authority to send for witnesses, nor, in short, in any way exercise the judicial power. He would further ask how they would proceed in the case of a contested election. Would it be under oath? Might gentlemen perform a part of their duties under the Constitution, before taking the oath, and the rest afterwards? He would undertake to say that no gentleman would sit and act in the important part of deciding on elections, before taking the oath. Mr. B. here read an act of Congress, which requires that the members shall take the oath before proceeding to business. The law, then, requiring that the Speaker shall administer the oath, it therefore followed that they could not legally proceed to business until after the election of Speaker. It was with the views he had offered that he was opposed to the course taken by the CLERK, and to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia. He was opposed to both, because there was no question before the House that it was competent to act upon. To his mind, they had nothing now to do with the question as to who were legally entitled to the seats, by virtue of a majority of the popular vote. No such question could be properly entertained at this time, in the partially organized condition of the House. Mr. B. then went on to argue that there was no good and sufficient reasons for passing by the State of New Jersey, in calling the roll. The reasons which had been offered did not exist in fact; for it mattered not whether New Jersey was called first or last, her members who came with the Governor's commission could not be excluded from taking their part in the organization. It was the duty of the CLERK to proceed in calling the roll, and there was no difficulty in the way to prevent it. Let the CLERK proceed—the House waited for him—the Constitution waited for him—the law waited for him. The wheels of Government were arrested by his pause. In the name of God and the Constitution, let him move on.

Mr. COOPER said, he appeared as a Representativefrom the State of Georgia; and without intending any disparagement to those who may have omitted to do as much, he presented in his hand, for the inspection of the members of the Twenty-sixth Congress, now assembled from the several States, the evidence of that character, which, until now, had been assumed amongst you. It was a commission to which was affixed the great seal of the State of Georgia.

Sir, said Mr. C. I rise for the purpose of making a few statements, on which may arise several questions pertinent to the position of affairs here existing. From these inferences may be drawn by which we may understand what relation the individuals now present bear to each other, and to the country. I shall be able thereby to show the views I entertain of the powers of this unorganized mass of individuals.

He felt proud to realize, for the first time, the presence around him of the talented, distinguished, and worthy members, of the most august assemblage of legislators known to the world. It is no other than a meeting of the Representatives of the several States, for the purpose of organizing the Twenty-sixth Congress, convened pursuant to a compact of union entered into between the States. That compact was the Constitution.

He said the members of Congress are here. This statement, though doubtless true, was manifest only in part. What now, he asked, is our true condition? The persons present having called to their aid, by authority of precedent and usage, the CLERK of a former Congress, by common consent, agreed to pursue the course heretofore adopted for organization. By that course, the CLERK was required to call the States severally, beginning with Maine, passing thence South and West, so far as he might be fortified with reasons to believe members were present. He had called the States thus in order, asking the several members so called to respond to their names. Thereupon he enrolled the names called to represent each State, until he arrived at New Jersey. He then sounded the name of one member, and enrolled it. Here he suspended the call, making known to those present that five other names were returned by New Jersey. These five, said Mr. C. bear respectively a commission under the great seal of the State, in like manner and in due form with the first, certifying them to be members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress. But that the CLERK has also in his possession papers purporting to be credentials, or certificates of election, in favor of other five persons, showing them to be the elect of New Jersey. These certificates are signed and sealed, but not by he great seal of the State. The CLERK, finding in himself no authority to decide which shall be called, asks the advice of those present. Thus far, he said it seemed to him, he has pursued a prudent course.

Under these circumstances, sir, (said Mr. C.) various propositions are made in successive order, on which has obtained a protracted discussion. During its progress, grave and novel as is the attitude we are in, principles the most grave have been advocated or denied.

It appeared to him that the names already called and enrolled, did not constitute a quorum of a House of Representatives.

The embarrassment was apparent to all, and each one in turn repeats the inquiry, What shall be done? The CLERK could not proceed without advice. Less than a quorum could not advise. None but members elect could advise; and the multitude present, not yet called, he said, were not known as members. The CLERK, he contended, could not pass over New Jersey, without the unanimous consent of the individuals present, forasmuch as by unanimous consent it was agreed she should be called in the order she now stands in. Hence would arise continually the question, What could be done?

Amidst the various propositions submitted, there were two into which all the others ultimately would run. One was, to pass New Jersey, by allowing her no Representative, because of the contest. The other was, to admit the members certified by the seal of the State, he said, for want of power, at this period, to question the right of those who bear it.

Mr. C. said that, impelled by a sense of duty to the country, and of respect to those he addressed, he felt bound to repeat no more of what others had urged than was necessary to the presenting fairly what occurred to him as new. He would also endeavor to bear in mind one other good rule, which was to "quit when he had done."

At this stage of proceeding, he held they could not entertain a question as to the right of the five persons from New Jersey, who came with the great seal of the State, accompanied by a certificate in due form.

Mr. C. said, in the argument here, he was almost superseded by the clear and forcible illustrations of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] followed by those of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN.] He did not hope to add weight to what they had urged. Hence, having made the statements he designed to make, he proceeded to ask, Who and what they were that now debated this matter? They were not the House of Representatives, because, though placed together in this hall, they did not yet know each other as such, having exhibited no credentials, nor answered to their names. Until that should be done, they were no more a House, as contemplated by the Constitution, than before they left home. "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen," &c. says the Constitution. This imports a placing together of members recognised by each other in some House.

What, then, said Mr. C. are we, sir? We are the persons "chosen" "by the people of the several States." (This he asserted for his colleagues and himself, and presumed of others, for sake of illustration.) They had come together, he said, in that House, and were inquiring of each other's membership. Before being satisfied, except as to part, they had come to a pause. Was it true, then, that anterior to being known to each other as members, and even before coming here, they were, in fact, members of this Congress, now being "composed" into a House of Representatives? Such, said he, was the fact; otherwise their coming here, or their meeting together, or this hall, had made them members.

If members of Congress, before they arrived here, when and how became they so? Sir, let the Constitution speak, the compact of union, and by it let every Nullifier abide.

The Constitution says, section 4th: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." Thus, it appears, the act of the State determines the how and the when a man becomes a member. But how does she make her act known? Here, too, she was left untrammelled, for they dared not inquire into the mode in which she chose to make it known. Whether her letters patent, with her seal affixed, contain the whole fact, or whether by them she make known that it is properly evinced by certificate of a justice of the peace, was immaterial. When she declared she had done an act, and put her seal to the declaration, she had done the most solemn act she could perform. We, said Mr. C. are bound to respect it; so is every earthly power, unless, to some, she had delegated power to call it in question.

Had she delegated such a power; if so, to whom? By the Constitution, section 5, the House of Representatives "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This grant of power is to the "House, composed" and formed as before shown, and to none other, and at no other time. Until that tribunal, pointed out by and with her consent and authority, and that of her sister States, was created or "composed," her most solemn declaration was conclusive, touching the election, binding on them for the time, and all the world besides. So true was this, that between sovereign States, a discrediting one State by another is just cause of war. How then should they escape the conclusion? Should they, an unorganized body, not yet characterized before each other, "members," "elect," "chosen," but not "composed" into a House, before the grant of power is delivered, assume to set aside an act of sovereignty —nay, drive from their presence the sovereignty itself, in the persons of their Representatives? Yes, sir, he said, the sovereignty; because, although he might, before the proper tribunal, be taught there was a fallacy in it all, still, for the present, he must act on the presumption that an act, having such authenticity, did truly transpire. And whilst he conceded the position of the gentleman from Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS] that the people in a primary assembly might perform acts paramount to the great seal, the laws, and our Constitution, he still maintained, what he thought a Nullifier ought, that in the absence of any act of a primary assembly to the contrary, the expressed will of a people, evinced by the most solemn act of their superior agent, in form and manner directed by them, was a sovereign act, on the plain principle that what one does by an agent he does by himself.

Here, sir, said Mr. C. permit me to pause for a moment to review the relations of those I have met here, whilst I point to the positions occupied by what I understand to be the two great contending parties that divide the politicians of this country. Not for the purpose of denunciation or acrimony, but hoping to excite none on the part of either, and feeling none, I recur to them to enforce what I say. I appeal to the acts and sayings of both to demonstrate that, in this matter, consonant with what one party now says and does, and that which the other of late said and did. There ought to be found no one objecting to the proposition requiring us to recognise, for the present, without question, the members from New Jersey who bear the great seal of the State.

Before doing this, he asked to be allowed to state that, in coming here a Nullifier, and believing the perpetuity of the Union greatly depended on the preservation of that Republican faith, and being identified with the State Rights party from choice, education, and habit, yet knowing no rule but the faith contained in the creed, he was taught to believe he should find here that party he was used to oppose, more nearly professing and acting out his principles than their opponents. On the point here debated, he found, he said, most, if not all the Opposition, especially the gentleman from Virginia and the one from New York, leading in a way that looks as familiar to his eye, as the road to the mill. If, then, the Democratic Republicans, as they are sometimes called, should be found in the same track, for one time they should all harmonize on a ground, at one period or other maintained by each.

To show, sir, said Mr. C. that my views ought to be sustained, and that, on this point, they and I ought not to differ, I beg to read from an authority they will no doubt recognise.

Mr. C. read from the Globe, of July 17th, 1838, from a document, the caption of which is as follows:

"At a meeting of Republican members of the Senate and House of Representatives, held at the Capitol, July 6th, 1838, the Hon. John M. Niles of Connecticut, and the Hon. Charles E. Haynes of Georgia, being chairmen, and the Hon. George M. Keim of Pennsylvania, and the Hon. H. L. Turney of Tennessee, acting as secretaries, the address to the people of the United States was received, and further considered; whereupon, on motion of the Hon. Hiram Gray of New York, it was Resolved, That the address be signed and published by the committee who prepared it, in behalf of the Republican members of Congress."

From that paper I read the following extracts, to wit:

"Hence the different light in which the two parties viewed the character of the system. The Republican party held it to be federative in its character, and formed by the States in their sovereign capacity, and adopted for their mutual security and happiness, while many of their adversaries regarded it as a great National Republic, formed by the American people in the aggregate, to promote the interest of the majority, instead of the several States composing it.

"We adhere to the constitutional doctrines of the Republican party of 1798 '9. We adopt the rule of strict construction they maintained. These are the principles upon which we would have our Government administered; and a reference to our views upon the great and agitating topics of the day will, we trust, show that we are disposed to carry these principles into practice by our public acts."

These are doctrines (said Mr. C.) familiar to us—sound and good. Now, sir, here is a case to apply them. Let us stand to them through evil report as well as good; take hold of them, and looking nor right nor left, let us see what first arises. I now invoke those who have adopted these principles—I affectionately invite them (for I truly feel affection for all who sincerely take hold of such) to arrest this controversy, and by unanimous consent put an end to debate.

This was a union of States, not of the aggregate mass of the whole people of this Union. Therefore New Jersey properly speaks in this case in her organic capacity, and we, at this time, cannot controvert her, or permit it to be done in a way not appointed. We, said Mr. C. hold to the doctrine of "strict construction" of delegated powers. Therefore we, to whom no power is delegated, cannot inquire to to discredit or overrule New Jersey.

But again, sir, continued Mr. C. remembering still that my appeal is to all who hold this doctrine of strict construction, let me here demonstrate what mainly I rose to prove. It is this: that by the power delegated, no judgment can obtain by us now, or the House hereafter, "of the election, return and qualification," &c. of any one not admitted to be a member. There must be something in possession purporting to be an "election" or "return"—some man, professing and acting, presumed or taken to be a member amongst you. You cannot act on nothing—against no one. How can you judge of "elections" where none appear, or of "returns" where none exist. As well might you attempt to take nothing from nothing.

But, in addition to this reason, from the nature of things, there was a still better reason for a strict constructionist, found in the Constitution.

The power to judge was by the Constitution (sec. 5,) given "of the elections and returns and qualifications of its own members." Here, then, the grant by strict construction was given to judge concerning one who is a "member"—not only one who is a member, and so claims to be, but actually is in his seat exercising his rights. Without this, he is no member.

Further still: he must likewise be a member in whom the House claims an interest, an ownership. He must be the House's "own member." Until then, and of any other, you judge without a delegated power.

Do not say that this is unreasonable; not so: it is just what the compact of union contemplates, to wit, that each State should be represented.

Of representatives, "members chosen by the people of the several States," shall the House be "composed." So you perceive, without a violation of principle, assuming the object to be to admit the second five, you can only do it by first recognising the first five.

Seeing, therefore, that having consented to adopt a mode now progressing, but interrupted—not to be changed or departed from but by like consent—that your professed principles require you to respect for the time being, what you may think will ultimately be found to be a pretended claim, and that the Opposition are now occupying ground you were wont to assume; then, in the name of the peace, good order and dignity of this assemblage; by the regard you have to the sovereignty of the States; and the interest you feel for the good of the country; withdraw for the time being all opposition to the Jersey members, who, without your admission or denial, are members, and were so before they, you, or I, assembled here, and who can only be ousted by the action of the constituted authority sitting in judgment on these; "its own members."

Unless, said Mr. C. you shall so consent, there is but one mode to get out of the difficulty orderly. That will be to give to the CLERK, by the respective State delegations, that advice which, as a mass, cannot be asked of us; then, according to that advice, let the CLERK withhold one or other set of credentials.

Mr. STANLY, in a few words, was understood to appeal to appeal to his friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. WISE said he would comply with the request of his friend from North Carolina. Considerable opposition had been made to the resolution, and if it could only pass by general consent, it must share the fate of all the other propositions that had been made, and be lost. Mr. W. said he still adhered to the position he assumed yesterday, that neither was the CLERK the judge of the Representatives from New Jersey, nor was the House. The tribunal was in New Jersey alone. He agreed with the gentleman from Georgia, whose remarks struck him with much force, that they must either agree to let the gentlemen from New Jersey take their seats, or agree on some mode of ejecting them. Yesterday, said Mr. W. addressing the CLERK, I appealed to you, sir, to recede from your decision, but you have satisfied me that you could not have taken any other course; and that had you not, when in calling the roll you came to New Jersey, referred the case to the House, some member would have objected to your proceeding with the call of that State, and thus we should have been in the same position we now are. I intended to appeal to you yesterday, and ask you if you would establish a precedent which would result in an appeal to physical force, a resort to which all of us would revolt from. But for referring this matter to the House as you have done, you have satisfied me that it was impossible for you to avoid it.

In reference to the resolution he had submitted, Mr. W. said that if he could consent to call witnesses in relation to his conduct on that floor, there were witnesses enough present who well knew how the resolution originated, and that it was far from him to intend to accomplish any party trick, but that his purpose was to carry it out in good faith. He was now willing to compromise the matter, and would take the pledge of any gentleman of the other party—the rest of that party, by their silence, acquiescing in it—that no advantage should be taken of him and his friends, by organizing the House before settling the question as to who should have the seats for New Jersey, and would then agree that the CLERK should go on calling the roll of undisputed members, till a quorum was formed. His resolution, however, was between Scylla and Charybdis. His honorable colleague [Mr. CRAIG] was for going into the merits of the election. Now he protested against going behind the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, and gave various reasons why it could not be done before the election of a Speaker. Gentlemen on the other side said that they would not be bound by mere technicalities. It was a common habit of some minds to deride technicalities; but truth could not be arrived at without them. What was law, but technicality? Admit that you can go behind the certificates. I ask, said Mr. W. if it must not be done by legal evidence? And if you have the evidence, that is legal. It was absurd to say that the people of New Jersey have determined against the five gentlemen who have the commission of the Governor, unless you can bring legal evidence to prove it. It was absurd to say that the people had determined in one way or the other, unless you take their will, as expressed by their constituted authorities.

If he was not considered by many present to be a blind partisan, he would appeal to gentlemen on the other side earnestly and affectionately, as the gentleman from Georgia did, to pause and reflect on the position in which they were placed. He would beg of them, by every consideration of patriotism, of good feeling, of magnanimity, and even of convenience, that they would suffer the call of the roll to go on, without excluding the gentlemen from New Jersey who had the usual and regular commissions, and complete the organization of the House, so as to proceed to the despatch of the public business.

Some gentlemen had told him that if his resolution should be adopted, they must go into the merits of the elections from New Jersey; and it also had been suggested that the resolution might be repealed, and not carried out in good faith. His friends appealed to him to withdraw it, and thus pressed on both sides, he felt it necessary to withdraw it.

Before he sat down, he must read, for the information of the House, a precedent which he found in a newspaper, bearing directly on the case before them, and in which the present President of the United States supported the position occupied by him and his friends. Mr. W. here read a case of a contested election decided in the Legislature of New York in the year 1814.

Mr. HUNT made a few observations in relation to the resolution made by him. The discussion on this subject, he said, had been exhausted, and yet, judging from the past, they were as far from settling the difficulty as ever. Without entering into any argument, he would put it to gentlemen, whether it was not their duty to devise some mode by which the organization of the House could be effected—some means by which no one party should have an advantage over the other; and he would seriously submit it to gentlemen whether every consideration of patriotism, of good feeling, and of expediency, did not require them to pursue this course.

We are all, said he, desirous of getting out of this difficulty, and he knew no means of accomplishing this object, more effectual than the resolution he had submitted. If any gentleman would offer a proposition more agreeable to the House, and better calculated to effect the object in view, he would give it his cordial support. But, as he thought his proposition was the fairest for all parties that could be offered, he hoped the House would accede to it. Mr. H. then proceeded to give his resolution in detail, and concluded by expressing his belief that it would relieve the CLERK of the House from all embarrassment, and enable them to organize, and proceede to the despatch of the public business, without giving either party the advantage over the other.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose, and made a few suggestions, which he hoped would enable the House to get out of the difficulty in which it was involved. He would advert to a clause in the Constitution, which bore directly on that matter. In the first place, it was there provided, that a majority of members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and, secondly, that a less number than a quorum should have the power to adjourn from day to day, and to compel the attendance of absent members. The first thing, then, they had to do, was to ascertain if a quorum was present; this was usually done by the CLERK calling over the names of members; and when he called the name of a member, and no one objected, there was a tacit acknowledgment by the House that he was a member. The CLERK thus going on with his call, and no one objecting, as in ordinary cases, a quorum was formed, competent for the transaction of business. Now, how did their present condition vary from this state of the case? The CLERK went on calling the roll until he got to the State of New Jersey, and then the stumbling-block was put in the way by himself. Why did he stop when he came to the State of New Jersey? why did he refer this matter to the House? The CLERK here was clearly wrong; he had no right to take the course he did. In the case of Moore and Letcher, the Clerk called the name of Moore, and the objection was raised by a member of the House; an objection which any member had a right to make, but which the Clerk had not. In the cases of Gholson and Claiborne, and of Allen of Kentucky, the objections were also raised by a member of the House, and not by the Clerk. The CLERK, therefore, had departed as well from the usage of the House as from the precedents established in several similar cases. One means of getting out of the difficulty in which they were involved, had been recommended by the gentleman from Virginia; and that was, going on with calling the names of members whose right to seats was undisputed, until a quorum was formed. This course he at present approved of, though he admitted some other proposition might be made that would meet with more general favor. In the hope that some such proposition would be made, he would suggest an adjournment, in order that gentlemen might think over the matter, and be prepared by the morning to adopt some course that would enable them to go on with the organization of the House.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, December 5, 1839.

The resolutions submitted to the Senate yesterday, coming up for consideration,

Mr. HUBBARD suggested whether there might not be some impropriety in adopting resolutions of inquiry, to which responses might be made before the Message of the President would be received by the Senate. He therefore suggested to his friend from Missouri whether it would not be proper to postpone acting on them until the reception of the Message.

Mr. BENTON expressing his willingness to acquiesce in whatever course the Senate thought proper to take,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, they were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that, at the earliest day it would be proper to do so, he would ask leave to introduce a bill making appropriations for the completion of certain roads commenced by the United States in the State of Michigan.

Mr. FULTON gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill to provide for the defence of the western borders of the States of Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas.

2. A bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and Choctaw Indians.

3. A bill making appropriations to complete certain military roads in the State of Arkansas.

4. A bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas.

5. A bill to authorize the inhabitants of townships eight north, range thirty-two west, in the State of Arkansas, to enter a section of land in lieu of the sixteenth section in said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes.

6. A bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers in the late war to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof, and for other purposes.

7. A bill for the relief of Richard T. Banks, of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. CLAY of Ala. gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June 22, 1838.

2. A bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company.

3. A bill to grant to the States and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads or canals the right of way through the public lands of the United States.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bill, viz:

A bill to repeal the act entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries," approved July 29, 1813, and to repeal all acts in continuation or amendment of the same.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, December 5, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, the CLERK called the House to order, and stated that at the adjournment on yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose to address the House, but gave way to

Mr. HUNT, who made an explanation in relation to the resolution he had submitted on yesterday. Some gentlemen, he said, entertained the idea that, if it was adopted, no action of the House could be had on any other subject than the case of the New Jersey election. He contemplated no such thing by the resolution, as his object was that the House should organize speedily, and go on with the business which had brought them together.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then rose, and commenced by saying that when the House adjourned on yesterday, he was attempting to arrive at the principles upon which they might proceed and organize the House, and examining the peculiar situation in which the House had been placed. Some gentlemen contended that if the CLERK had called the names of the five members from New Jersey, it would have settled the case, and relieved the House from the difficulty in which it had been placed. Such, however, was not the fact in his view of the case. Suppose the CLERK had called one of the five members from New Jersey, and any member on the floor had rose and objected to his taking his seat, we would then be in precisely the same position in which we are now. He held that he had the right to object to any one of the members from that State taking their seats, and his objection must be heard, and decided by the House. In the case of Claiborne and Gholson, a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] objected to their taking their seats, and called for further testimony in the case, and the House laid the gentleman's motion on the table.

Mr. U. then submitted the following proposition:

The Clerk of the late House of Representatives, in calling the roll of members of the Twenty-sixth Congress, began at the State of Maine and proceeded regularly, according to usage, until he came to the State of New Jersey. He called JOSEPH F. RANDOLPH, as a member from that State, and then stated in substance, that there were ten persons besides Mr. RANDOLPH claiming to be Representatives from the State of New Jersey, and insisting on their right to take seats as members, when by law the State was entitled to six Representatives only; and that he declined calling any of the claimants, believing it to be his duty not to decide who were entitled. A debate thereupon arose, and the members elected have been unable in the usual manner to recognise each other, to ascertain whether there was a quorum in attendance, and to organize the House. For the purpose, therefore, of obviating all further difficulty,

Resolved, That the CLERK of the late House ought, and he is hereby directed, to proceed in calling the roll, and each person called who answers to his name, and against whom no objection is urged to his taking a seat, shall be counted as a member in ascertaining whether there be a quorum present, and each person so called, against whom objection may be made, shall not be counted; but, upon objection being made, the CLERK shall pass by the person objected to and call another. After the roll shall have been called through, if there be a quorum present of persons against whom no objection s have been raised, such quorum shall proceed to decide upon the claims of those who have not been called by the CLERK, or who, if called, have been pretermitted in consequence of objections raised against them, and shall determine which of the claimants shall participate in the organization of the House; Provided, however, That nothing herein contained, and no decision which may be made, admitting any one to participate in the organization of the House, shall be construed to bar or preclude the House, after it shall have been duly organized, from investigating, judging, and deciding upon the election returns and qualifications of each of those whose right to a seat is questioned, before the House is organized, and who may be admitted to participate in the organization of the House by a decision in pursuance of this resolution.

Mr. U. contended that this was the only plan by which this matter ever could be brought to a conclusion. It had been suggested to him who should vote on this question. In reply to that, he would say that he thought every one who came there claiming to be a member of the House, might vote upon it. The presumption was, when a set of gentlemen assembled at the seat of Government at the time of the meeting of Congress, as the Representatives of the people, that they were entitled to vote on all preliminary questions of organization; and if they could not do so, it was manifest to him that this question never could be settled. There must be some mode by which this question could be settled, and he knew of none other than the one he had pointed out. Gentlemen had inquired whether we had not the power to go behind the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey, previous to the organization of the House. He contended you could not, and that it would be an outrage on all precedent, law, and usage, to do so. Gentlemen had asked, will you not allow fraud to be exposed—will you not allow us to exhibit a majority of the votes of the people in favor of political liberty, and the great rights of the people? These arguments, however, appeared to him to be more specious than sound. He admitted that you could go behind the returns, but it must be done by organizing a proper tribunal to try the question; and in order that this tribunal might be raised, it was essentially necessary that the House should first be organized, and the oaths be administered to members according to the Constitution and laws. Then the case could be brought up, and evidence might be adduced on both sides. This was his view of the case, but it seemed to be the opinion of some gentlemen, by their arguments and by the course they pursued, that you can decide the case without giving the parties a hearing at all. According to the arguments of some gentlemen, it was only necessary for a gentleman to claim the seat of a member of this House and the CLERK was bound to pass over his name when he arrived at it on the roll. He might put the case of BARTON and LUCAS He understood from the newspapers that there was a gentleman by the name of BARTON who claimed the seat of Mr. LUCAS, and would gentlemen pretend that he was not entitled to his seat merely because this other gentleman claimed it? He contended that the course pointed out by his resolution was the only correct course, and referred to the argument in the case of Moore and Letcher, and to other cases, as evidence in support of his view of the question.

Mr. RANDOLPH next rose to address the House, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired if the gentleman could take the floor, having spoken twice already.

The CLERK said, as there were no rules adopted for the government of the House, he did not feel authorized to prevent the gentleman from speaking.

Mr. RANDOLPH then addressed the House at considerable length. He contended that the laws of the State of New Jersey had been fully complied with, and that his colleagues, as well as himself, had sufficient evidence to entitle them to their seats in the first instance, and that it was not in the power of the CLERK, or the House, to deprive them of that right. The law of the State of New Jersey was paramount to the CLERK, and he was bound to call the names of his colleagues if he performed his duty. It was their right to take their seats in the first instance, and it was not in the power of the House to go into a full investigation of the case until it was properly organized; and then it must be done upon petition. For a long time, in the history of this Government, this House, even after it was organized, would not go behind the certificate and commission of the member. For several Congresses this was the law. In two cases Congress decided that it would not go behind the certificate of a Governor when it was made out in accordance with the laws of the State. In the case of Spalding and Meade, from Georgia, there were three counties which did not reach the Governor until after the time expired by law, in consequence of a storm which interrupted these returns, and when this case was brought before the House upon petition, after its organizaion, the sitting member claimed his seat, because he held the returns which had been made out according to the laws of Georgia, and that the House had no right to go behind the return. Mr. R. in support of his position, referred to the case of Moore and Letcher, and the arguments of Messrs. Lane, Beardsley, and Hubbard upon that question. He also referred to the case of Claiborne and Gholson, and various cases which had occurred in the New Jersey Legislature, all of which he maintained supported the position that his colleagues were entitled to their seats in the first instance. Mr. R. next replied to the remarks of Mr. VANDERPOEL, and held that his colleagues did not claim their seats upon any technicality of the law, but because they believed they were entitled to them. They would scorn to claim them upon a mere technicality.

Mr. R. next replied to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, who he said had attempted to draw a distinction between the people and the Government of New Jersey. He would ask that gentleman how the people would express their sovereignty, if they did not do it through their constituted authorities? There was a time when a foreign Prince attempted to draw the same distinction which the gentleman had drawn, and take an appeal from the Government of this country to the people. He would ask that gentleman what his course would be, in case he came here with a commission from the Governor of South Carolina, under the great seal of the State, and another person came here to prevent him from participating in the organization of the House?

Mr. PICKENS rose to explain. He did not pretend to give an opinion with regard to the great seal. When that question arose, he would be prepared to decide it upon its merits. He meant to assert that this House was made the supreme tribunal by the Constitution of the United States, and that it might take its own course. He did not pretend to justify this course, or that course. He asserted the power of the House to take what course it thought proper. It might pass by the great seal of the State of New Jersey, if it pleased, as insufficient evidence, and it was accountable to nobody but its constituents. He did not choose to be represented by any gentleman as having assumed a position which he did not take, and thererore he rose to make this explanation.

Mr. RANDOLH resumed, and said if that distinction had not been taken by the gentleman from South Carolina, it had been taken by some other gentleman. Mr. R. said he placed this matter on constitutional grounds, and warned gentlemen to beware how they disregarded their injunctions. Some gentlemen, in the course of their remarks, had spoken of him as being entitled to rights and privileges which his colleagues were not entitled to. But he begged leave to say to gentlemen, that he did not consider himself entitled to any greater privilege than his colleagues. He had always considered himself on an equality with them; and when they had offered a proposition to their opponents to resign, and try the matter again before the people, he had claimed the honor of doing so likewise, and they were only prevented from doing so by the advice of friends. He contended that the certificate of the Secretary of State was wholly void, and of no effect; that that officer had no power whatever to grant a certificate in this case, and that the CLERK had no right to pass over the names of those who had the Governor's certificate.

Mr. ADAMS rose, and addressing himself to the House said:

Fellow-citizens and members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress: I address myself to you, and not to the CLERK in that chair, under a painful sense of my own duty. The CLERK, in the performance of official duties assigned to him by the laws of the United States, commenced reading the roll of the members here assembled for the purpose of constituting a House of Representatives of the United States in the Twenty-sixth Congress. After calling the roll, commencing with the State of Maine, as far as the State of New Jersey, and the members whose names he called having answered—ascerta ning their presence here—he paused after calling the name of one of the members from New Jersey, and stated to the House that the seats of the five other members from New Jersey were contested; that he, deeming himself not authorized to decide which of the two parties of five members were entitled to seats, must refer that decision to the House; and then immediately, or shortly afterwards, a question arose, and the proposition being presented to the House, he again, in the discharge of a solemn duty, declared that he could not put a question to the House till it was organized. Now, fellow-citizens, I am reduced to the necessity of appealing to you. Your CLERK has decided that he could not proceed; he refers the decision to you, and then he refuses to put the question in order that you may make the decision; and has persisted in the refusal to put a question of any kind until he discovered yesterday that he might put the question of adjournment. Now, fellow-citizens, in what predicament are we placed? We are fixed here as firm and as immoveable as those columns; we can neither go forward nor backward; and the CLERK tells us that he will persist in both these decisions. What, then, can we do? I have waited here four days with a firm determination not to enter into this controversy. It was with a firm determination not to say one word on the subject, that I remained in my seat until now. At the last session of Congress, foreseeing what might happen, I offered a resolution to this House for the purpose of preventing the difficulty in which we are involved; but that resolution was not adopted, and the difficulty that I then foresaw has overtaken us. For many reasons I had determined not to say one word on the subject before us, and I should still persist in that determination if I did not find it impossible for the House to proceed one step until relieved from its present embarrasment. We might stay here until doomsday, and not be one step nearer to our organization than we now are, unless we adopt some mode of relieving ourselves from the difficulty in which the decision of the CLERK has placed us. Now, all this is very extraordinary. Here is a body of men assembled from the twenty-six States of the Union—a more complete representation than ever was assembled here before—and here we are under the solemn convictions of duty, and yet without form or order, and unable to progress one step towards the discharge of the public business. The CLERK has told us that he acted under the solemn convictions of duty, and I concede that he has. I do not even question whether that sense of duty was correctly applied, but I do say that he has placed us in a position in which we also have solemn duties to perform. Now, what are we to do? This complete representation of the people of the United States has assembled here, and the Constitution has enjoined upon it a solemn duty. What is it? To organize itself. If there is any difficulties in effecting this organization, let us do what Mr. Jefferson has told us the General Assembly of the State of Virginia did, when Lord Dunmore dissolved them. They adjourned to a tavern, and there constituted themselves a convention. This might be deemed irregular; but I do think that, on the fourth day of the session, in a state of disorganization, it is rather late to make any objection on the ground of irregularity. I address myself to you, fellow-citizens, and call upon you in the name of the people of the United States, to discharge your duty. Organize yourselves, and when that is done, you can take up and decide questions as you heretofore have done. I call upon the whole House. I call upon the majority which composes it to proceed to its organization. We have recently been told, in the official organ of the present Administration, that there is a majority—setting aside the members from New Jersey, or counting them—that there is a majority of friends of the Administration elected to the present Congress. And not only has the organ stated that fact, but he mentions the precise number—one hundred and twenty-one members, and every one of them is here present. Now I call upon that one hundred and twenty-one to organize the House. I call upon them in the name of their country—I will not say in the name of the Administration, for I have not a right to invoke it; but I call upon them in the name of the people of the United States to organize the House; and I offer, for that purpose, to this assemblage, the following resolution which lies upon the table of your CLERK, and which, like all other resolutions that have been placed there, lies in the limbo valley, the paradise of fools. We may go on ad infinitum, to the end of time, laying resolutions on the CLERK's table, and he will not put the question on one of them. We cannot control the CLERK. He is, in the position which he has assumed, an absolute despot; and unless you set aside all his decisions, and act for yourselves, you will not be able to advance one step. This resolution which I now offer, was offered yesterday by a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] (and a number of resolutions have been offered since,) but it is in the same condition in which all the rest of them are.

Mr. A. here read the resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That the Acting Clerk of this House shall proceed with the call of the members from the different States of the Union in the usual way, calling the names of such members from New Jersey as hold the regular and legal commissions from the Executive of that State.

Mr. GRAVES here suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the resolution would need some modification. Having understood from a friend that the CLERK was willing to proceed with the call of the roll if it was the will of the majority of the House that he should do so, he addressed a letter to him on the subject, which he would now read, with the CLERK's answer:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"Dec. 5, 1839.

"HUGH A. GARLAND, Esq.: If a majority of the members whose seats are uncontroverted signify in writing their desire that you proceed regularly with the call of the New Jersey members holding commissions from the Executive of that State, will you conform to that expression of their will?

"Respectfully,

"W. J. GRAVES."

To this note Mr. GARLAND returned the following reply:

"For Mr. GRAVES: If a majority of the members whose seats are uncontroverted signify in writing their desire that I shall proceed with the call of the roll made in the conscientious regard to my duty, and that I shall then present to the House the testimony in contested cases, I will then proceed. I hope Mr. GRAVES will see the necessity of my proceeding in this way, and that he will appreciate my motives in adhering to that course. I honestly believe that to be the only course I can take; I most solemnly aver to him that I believe no party advantage can be taken in that course; and that none such is intended on my part.

"Respectfully,

"H. A. GARLAND."

So that his friend from Massachusetts, Mr. GRAVES continued, would see that if he, or any member of the House, should ask the CLERK to proceed with the call of the roll, and it should be so desired by a majority of the undisputed members present, he will not consent to it, but will proceed only with the roll "which he has made out in the conscientious discharge of his duty."

Mr. ADAMS continued. I am under the necessity of appealing to you, fellow-citizens, to set aside the decisions of the CLERK and act for yourselves. In making this proposition, I have no reference to the CLERK. I propose that the House shall act in whatever form it pleases; it may choose a temporary Clerk, or not, as it thinks proper. I put this question to the majority of the House. It is their duty to organize it; and therefore they ought, as a preliminary step, to put themselves in such a situation that no decision of the CLERK can force upon the House an organization in the manner he dictates. The House may set aside the CLERK, but it is not forced to obey his despotical dictates. I make no objection to the CLERK himself. I speak only of his acts and the position in which he has placed us, which makes it impossible for us to come to any decision upon any proposition that may be made. I offer this resolution in its present form, because it was laid on your table, and your CLERK will not put the question on it. I appeal to the House, from the decision of the CLERK, to act for itself. If any gentleman present does not like the resolution, let him propose an amendment to it; and let the House decide both on it and the amendment. I wish to see what is the will of the majority. The CLERK, by his decision, makes it impossible for us to ascertain that will, through his agency, and I therefore wish to ascertain it directly from the House. I call upon this House in the first place to save us from the evils entailed upon us by the decision of the CLERK. We may be here a whole week, nay, a whole month, in our present situation, unless we devise some mode by which we can be relieved from it. I ask, if it is creditable to this House, that we shall consume further time in perfectly idle, useless debate, because the CLERK has placed us in a situation in which no question can be put. Now, I am willing that the CLERK shall be held responsible to the people of the United States for the four days of the time of this House that have been wasted in idle, unprofitable debate, upon questions that he will not put. I say that he is responsible for the waste of time that he has already occasioned; but now this House itself will be responsible for any further waste of time. I will go further, and say that the one hundred and twenty-one members which have been set down as friends of the Administration, are responsible to the people of the country, if the organization of the body for the despatch of the public business is not forthwith completed. I say that if there is a majority of this House determined to set aside the five members from New Jersey who have produced their credentials precisely in the same form with those produced by the member from that State, whose name the CLERK has called—if the majority of this House will say that those members shall not be permitted to sit, why let it say so, and that majority will be responsible to the country and the world for such decision. Now, I believe, that they cannot say so; and in my private opinion, I believe that it is the rights of the people of New Jersey that are involved. I say nothing about the Governor of the State, nor any portion of the State, but the people. These five men came here with the authority of the Constitution and the laws declaring them to be the representatives of the State of New Jersey; and the laws and Constitution of the United States, and the laws of the State of New Jersey, declare that no other evidence of membership than that produced by them shall be received here. Now I say that these men came here presenting that evidence; that one of them has been received as a member, and if you refuse to receive the others, then it is not those members that you turn out of the House, but the sovereign people of New Jersey. Whoever may finally, and after proper investigation, be determined to be the true and lawful Representatives from New Jersey, these five are the present Representatives, and you cannot deprive them of their seats without outraging the people of their State. If you say that they shall not be received, it is the people they come to represent whom you reject, and whom you deprive of five-sixths of their representation. Now I have heard about an attack on the rights of the people of New Jersey; and have heard it stated that there is a contest between the people of New Jersey on the one hand, and the Governor and Council on the other. Why, that Governor and Council represent the people of New Jersey; and it must be borne in mind that long after these contested elections took place, and long after the Governor and Council decided who were the persons duly elected, they have been called upon to pronounce sentence upon the correctness of this decision, and they have done so by re-electing this very Governor and Council by whom it was given. My honorable friend over the way, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] who intends to offer an amendment to the resolution I have submitted, in his ardent appeals to this House in favor of the sacred rights of the people of New Jersey, proposes, in the very act of flattering them, to take away their rights; for if the members from New Jersey are not called, the people of that State will be deprived of their rights, and five-sixths of their voice will be suppressed in the important proceeding of organizing this body. The appeals of the gentleman in favor of the rights of the people, and his manner of showing his regard for them, put me in mind of a story I have read in the Bible, where a man goes up to another and affectionately asks, "Art thou in health, my brother," and then stabs him under the fifth rib. Now the manifestations of love and respect are very various. I profess to have as much love and respect for the rights of the people as my friend from New York, who I understand is to be one of the leaders of this House, and therefore I speak of him with great respect and deference; but his mode of showing love and respect for the rights of the people, is to take away their rights, while mine is to use my best endeavors to prevent their being deprived of them; and as I cannot give them a double representation on this floor, which the Constitution does not allow, I will give them that representation which the evidence of their constituted authorities shows to be the true one. Mr. A. then submitted the resolution which he had previously read.

Mr. MERCER suggested to his friend from Massachusetts, that the same difficulty would again occur of putting the question on this resolution.

Mr. ADAMS said he was willing to wait awhile to see what amendments gentlemen might propose to the resolution. He then proposed to put the questions to the House himself. He protested against the CLERK's putting any question.

Mr. RHETT asked of the CLERK if he had determined that he could not put questions to the House?

The CLERK proceeded to state that the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with past usage, was compelled to make out a roll of the members of the 25th Congress, to the best of his knowledge and ability, and under his own responsible sense of duty. Under that conviction, he had made out a roll on certain principles, which appeared to him to be true. Those principles he had not been permitted to state. He had not been allowed to explain the grounds upon which he had acted in performing, according to his sense of duty, the delicate charge which had been forced upon him. This first part of his duty being performed, he had, at the appointed hour of 12, proceeded, also according to usage, to call the roll. His duty was, when the roll was called, and a quorum was present, to put to the House all questions arising up to the time of the election of Speaker. All this the Clerk came prepared to do. In the call of the roll he was arrested——

[Very loud cries of "no! no! you were not arrested."]

The CLERK proceeded: A quorum had not been ascertained. The CLERK then, of course, could not proceed further until the House had determined in their own mode what was a quorum, and who were entitled to vote or not to vote. Unquestionably a quorum was present; there might be many more—there might be gentlemen who were not entitled to sit here. The CLERK, then, did that which he was bound to do—he took the roll as his guide.

If he had put a question, and a division by tellers had been called for, what would have been the result? Those in the affirmative would have passed through the tellers, and the number would have been taken down; then those who voted in the negative would have passed through the tellers, and the number taken down. Upon the enunciation of the vote, it might have appeared that there were two hundred and forty-seven votes; more votes than members of this House. The vote would be entirely lost, which ever way it went, or the CLERK would be compelled to take upon himself a responsiblity which does not belong to him; and which he had before endeavored to avoid, to decide between conflicting claims to the same seats.

[The CLERK was again interrupted by Mr. STANLY, who rose to put to the CLERK the following interrogatory: "Who arrested you?]

The CLERK. Whether the CLERK was arrested or not, is matter of no consideration; he was not allowed to go through his roll, or to determine what was a quorum of the House. He was prevented from performing that duty. The gentlemen present might act one way or the other—they might organize themselves, as was done in the first Congress. He could not now put questions as CLERK of the House, but, if it was the pleasure of the House, he could put questions as chairman of the meeting.

Mr. RHETT then offered a resolution that LEWIS WILLIAMS, the oldest member of the House, be appointed Chairman of this meeting until the House should be organized.

Mr. WILLIAMS objected to the introduction of the resolution. He thought they could have questions put if the CLERK would only do his duty as all other Clerks of the House had done. Besides, if it was competent to put the question on this resolution, it was also competent to put the question on the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which preceded it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked of the CLERK if he would be willing to put a question if a majority of members present desired it?

Mr. GARLAND stated that he was willing to put questions if it was the will of the House that he should do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then asked the CLERK to put the question on the resolution submitted by him.

Several voices were heard crying "No! no!" and much confusion prevailed at the time.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina submitted to the House, that sooner or later they must adopt the resolution just offered by his colleague, [Mr. RHETT] as it would be impossible for them ever to organize without some proceeding of the kind. The objection of the gentleman from North Carolina, that there was a resolution that had precedence, could only apply in regularly organized bodies, where Parliamentary rules could be observed, and did not apply to this meeting, which was yet in a state of disorganization.

Mr. RHETT then varied his motion, so as to call Mr. ADAMS to the Chair, instead of Mr. WILLIAMS, and putting the question himself to the meeting it was carried, and Mr. ADAMS took the Chair.

Much confusion and noise being heard in the galleries, and some hissing,

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said, that he announced to the galleries that if there was the slightest interruption to the business of the meeting, he would call on the President for a military force to preserve order.

On motion of Mr. MERCER,

Ordered, That the Rules of the last House of Representatives be adopted for the government of the proceedings of this meeting.

Mr. WISE then moved that the acting CLERK be directed to call the members of the House, including, in such call, the members from New Jersey, who have the certificates of the Governor of that State that they are elected as Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee moved an adjournment.

Mr. JENIFER called for the yeas and nays, but withdrew the call afterwards.

Mr. PETRIKEN renewed the call for the yeas and nays, and was sustained by several voices.

Mr. BRIGGS said that, as the rules of the last House of Representatives had been adopted, the yeas and nays must be called at the desire of one-fifth of the members present; but there was one difficulty in the way, the roll of the CLERK was not completed, and, therefore, the yeas and nays could not be called.

Several gentlemen calling for the appointment of tellers, to count the ayes and noes on the question of adjournment, Messrs. JOHNSON of Tennessee and DAVIES were appointed by the CHAIR, and the members severally passing between them, they reported that there were for the adjournment 103, and against it 90—so

The CHAIR announced that the House was Adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, December 6, 1839.

Mr. SPENCE appeared in his seat this morning.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the credentials of the Hon. SAMUEL S. PHELPS, elected by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March last, which were read.

The usual oath was then administered to Mr. PHELPS, and he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida which is now overrun and invested by marauding bands of hostile Indians.

2. A bill to define and establish the southern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bill:

Bill to remit such duties, and to cancel such bonds, as have been required of persons engaged in the whale fishery, to restrain all future exactions of duties of such vessels and their cargoes.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, December 6, 1839.

At twelve o'clock, Mr. ADAMS, appointed yesterday the Chairman pro tempore of the meeting, called the House to order; when

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose, and asked if the journals were to be read before proceeding to business.

The CHAIR replied that the rules of the House required that, not only the journal of the preceding day should be read, but the journal of each day's proceedings since the commencement of the session.

The CLERK then read the journals; after which,

Mr. WISE rose, and proposed to correct the journal, so that it might appear that the CLERK had refused to put questions to the House, and that it was in consequence of this refusal that the House had been compelled to appoint a Chairman pro tem. Mr. W. then submitted an amendment to the journal of last Monday, to show that the CLERK had refused to put any question to the House.

Mr. DUNCAN desired, if the journal was amended, that the whole truth might be told. The CLERK had distictly stated that, if it was the pleasure of the House, he would put questions. Let this be put upon the journal also.

Mr. BRIGGS then proposed to amend Mr. W's. motion—"the CLERK stated that he did not feel himself authorized to put any question to the members present, and a motion being made to adjourn, the CLERK decided he could not put that motion to the House."

Mr. WISE accepted this as a modification.

Mr. DROMGOOLE submitted, whether, in fairness to the CLERK, this motion ought not to be varied. The CLERK had stated that, in his opinion, he could not put questions until a quorum of members were ascertained to be present. This was the ground taken by the CLERK, and he thought, in perfect fairness, that this ought to be stated in the proposed amendment to the journal.

After a few remarks by Mr. CUSHING,

Mr. DROMGOOLE proposed the following as a substitute for Mr. WISE's amendment:

"The CLERK having declared that under the present imperfect stage of the organization of the House, no quorum having answered to their names, and there being no rules for the government of the body, he did not feel, under these circumstances, authorized to put any question to the members, except by general consent.

"A motion was thereupon made to adjourn. The CLERK decided that he could not submit that motion to the House."

Mr. WISE accepted this as a modification of his motion; which was agreed to by the House.

Mr. WISE then moved the following amendment to the journal of Tuesday, which was considered and agreed to:

"A motion being made to adjourn, the CLERK decided that he could not put that question to the House: Mr. CUSHING, of Massachusetts, objected to the CLERK declaring the House adjourned without a vote of the House."

Mr. WISE then moved the following amendment to the journal of Wednesday, which was considered and adopted:

"A motion made to adjourn, the CLERK stated that he was now of opinion that he could submit a motion to adjourn, but could submit no other motion."

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then moved the following amendment to the journal of Thursday, which was considered and adopted:

"Mr. RHETT asked the CLERK if he would put questions to the House? To which the CLERK replied, he would put no question except to adjourn, but said, with the consent of the House, he would put questions as chairman of a meeting of gentlemen present, but not as Clerk of the House of the Representatives, if instructed to do so by the members present;' when

"Mr. W. C. JOHNSON objected to his acting as chairman."

The CHAIR then stated that the questing pending was on the resolution of Mr. WISE, that the Acting Clerk be directed to call the members of the House, including, in such call, the members from New Jersey who have the certificates of Gov. Pennington.

Mr. RHETT then rose and stated that, before he sat down, he intended to make a motion to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table, for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested, and after the names of such members are called, and before a Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of all claimants to the seats contested on this floor.

This resolution was substantially the resolution offered by the Chairman [Mr. ADAMS] at the last session of Congress; it was substantially the resolution proposed the other day by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE]; it was substantially the resolution proposed yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and it was also substantially the first motion made upon the subject before the House by the other gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] It would thus appear, that the course which this resolution proposes we should pursue, was no invention of his, but the result of able minds from different parts of the House in their search for truth and justice. The resolution proposes partiality to none, and injury to the claims of none. It put both sets of claimants upon precisely the same footing; while giving the members whose qualifications were unquestioned their seats, a tribunal was established, by which the claims of the contestants could be determined. The case, the whole case, so far as the papers on your table contain it, (as in the case of Moore and Letcher,) will then be read, and laid before the House; and which ever way we determined, it could not be said that we acted unfairly, by excluding the testimony and the grounds by which either party claim their seats. The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] if adopted, would give the gentlemen from New Jersey who claim under the Governor's commission their seats, without the House having heard a single word of the testimouy and credentials by which their constituents affirm that they are entitled to them. Is this fair? Will the country deem it fair? Right or wrong, is it decent, or even politic, to force them away without granting them a hearing? It did appear to him, situated as we are, that the only equitable or honorable course was such as the resolution he offered proposes. Gentlemen must know that there is no precdent precisely in point to guide us, and they ought to meet this question in a spirit of compromise and accommodation. All that is asked is, to consider the whole matter as presented by the contesting parties. Do not consider a part. What can be gained? Might not a great deal be lost by such a course, so revolting to the most obvious dictates of equity? It is not to be presumed that gentlemen would claim seats upon this floor without a perfect conviction of the validity of their claims; and it was that they should be satisfied, and the country be satisfied, that we had carefully examined, and, to the best of our ability, determined, who, in this preliminary state, should take the seats belonging to New Jersey, and assist in the permanent organization of the House, that he proposed his resolution. He moved that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia should lie on the table.

Mr. R. concluded by moving that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia be laid on the table.

Mr. MERCER appealed to Mr. RHETT to withdraw the motion, but Mr. R. declined doing so.

Tellers being called for,

The CHAIR appointed Messrs. DROMGOOLE and BRIGGS tellers.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose, and stated that he had been called upon by the Chairman to discharge a duty, and he wished to know how that duty was to be discharged. He was informed that there were eleven gentlemen on this floor, all claiming to represent the State of New Jersey, when that State was only entitled to six members; and who of these members was he to count when the House was divided. He would not take upon himself to say which of them should not vote, and if he had to act in the capacity of a teller, he would count them all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAMS) here stated to the House what he conceived to be the rule. He conceived the rule to be, that the persons who presented the evidence required by the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of the State of New Jersey, were entitled to sit and vote in the House until deprived from doing so by the act of the House. This was his opinion, and he expressed it with more confidence, because he had declared it before he was placed by a vote of the House in the chair he now occupied.

Mr. VANDEPOEL appealed from this decision of the CHAIR, and said the question would then arise whether the gentlemen from New Jersey would vote in their own case. Mr. V. would like to know whether the Chairman had been appointed for the purpose of usurping to himself the power of deciding the very question which had been agitating this body for the last three or four days. Was this Chairman appointed for any such purpose as this? He apprehended not. He would respectfully appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, and then we would see whether these gentlemen would claim to vote, or be permitted to vote in their own case. If so, he would say that it would be not only an unprecedented, but a shocking spectacle.

Mr. WISE inquired if this appeal was debatable?

The CHAIR decided that it was.

Mr. RHETT then called the attention of the CHAIR and the House to the thirty-fourth rule of the House, which had been adopted for the government of the body, in the following words: "No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately or particularly interested."

Mr. R. made it a point to the CHAIR whether, under this rule, the members from New Jersey could vote.

The CHAIR considered that this rule did not apply to the present case, because it was not the members from New Jersey, but their constituents who were interested.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina held that the members from New Jersey, who had the Governor's certificate, were entitled to vote in their own case, and that it was not in the power of the House to deprive them of that right.

Mr. STANLY replied to the remarks made by Mr. VANDERPOEL. He had no idea that the members from New Jersey should be deprived from voting on what was called here their own case. He would leave it to their own good sense to say whether they would vote upon it or not, but he hoped they would not decline voting on account of any false delicacy. If they declined voting on this case, he held that they would not exhibit the same spirit which animated the Jerseymen of the Revolution. If they did not maintain their rights here, which were guarantied to them by the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of New Jersey, they would be unworthy of the confidence of the people of New Jersey.

Mr. BRIGGS contended that it was not a usurpation on the part of the CHAIR in deciding who were entitled to vote from the State of New Jersey. The CHAIR had answered the question of the gentleman from Virginia as he was bound to do, and he had answered it in strict accordance with the Constitution and the laws The CHAIRMAN had not usurped the powers of the House, because he had merely decided that which he was bound to decide, and which he could not escape from deciding, namely, that the five members from New Jersey who had he evidence of their right to seats under the Constitution and the laws, were entitled to vote on the present question.

Mr. GRANGER replied to the remarks of Mr. VANDERPOEL, contending that those who had the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey were entitled to all the rights and privileges of members of the House until their case was examined by a Committee of Elections, and decided upon by the House. Mr. G. then referred to the case of Allen and Fellows in the New York Legislature, contending that it was precisely similar to the present case, and stating that, at that time, the attorney general of the State of New York held the same opinion that the gentleman who held the certificate was entitled to his seat, and he took his seat and participated in the business of the House until the Committee of Elections decided against him, although by his vote alone the party in power held the preponderance.

Mr. CRAIG thought they were becoming more involved in difficulties every step. Let us turn as we pleased, there was a stumbling block in our way. He thought the proper mode of proceeding would be to settle the question of right. Let us have all the evidence presented to us, and then we can decide upon it according to the laws and the facts. We might as well hear all the evidence in the case, and then decide it, for to that we would have to come at last.

Mr. WISE thought if his colleague was ready to decide this question now, he was one of the most powerful and extraordinary judges who had ever decided on any question in this country.

Mr. CRAIG stated that he had not said that he was ready to decide on the question now. The course of proceeding he had suggested was to examine the evidence first, and then decide; and the sooner that course was adopted, the better it would be.

Mr. WISE contended that they had no right to examine into any thing further than the prima facie evidence under the Constitution and the laws, and that it was not competent for the body at the present time to enter into such an examination of the question as was suggested by his colleague. The House must first be organized, and the members sworn, before they can enter upon the discharge of so important a judicial investigation as the one proposed by his colleague. The members from New Jersey had exhibited to the House prima facie evidence of right, and could not be deprived of the privilege of voting upon every question which might arise.

Mr. W. said they had now got back into the position to which he had predicted on Monday last they must come; that was, that the presiding officer must decide the question. He had told the CLERK at that time that he would be bound to decide the question as to who was entitled to rights on that floor from New Jersey, and the CLERK had only escaped from making this decision by declaring that he could make no decision. The present Chairman, however, had decided the question, and this had fulfilled his prediction that it must be decided by the presiding officer of the body. The CLERK had decided that he could put no question to the House, and the House, from the law of necessity, was compelled to put some person in the CHAIR who would put questions, and when the gentleman from Massachusetts declared that he would put the question to the body, hope rose within him, and he saw that the House was about to be relieved from its embarrassments. Mr. W. proceeded to comment upon the course of proceeding, at some length, and concluded by eulogizing the conduct of the Chairman for his efforts to bring about an organization of the House.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS observed, that he was very reluctant to take any part in this debate, for he was sensible that very little new could be said by any body on the subject; but yet he could not sit tamely by and see it decided that the claimants to seats from New Jersey should dispose of a question in which they are personally interested. Before he proceeded to treat of this question of order, he hoped he might be permitted, as latitude had been allowed to others, to say a few words looking to the merits of this controversy. It has been said from one side, that this House has no evidence in its possession by which the truth of the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, to the five members who claim seats under it, can be controverted. Now, said Mr. T. is that the fact? Is it true that this House is not advised of matters justifying a resistance, in limine, to the rights claimed under these certificates. Have we not that before us which should make an upright and impartial judge refuse to decide the question in favor of those who claim under the Governor's certificate, until he has examined further? Is there a member here who does not know that there are facts, not on the face of the certificates, which are material to the truth of this issue? Is it not notorious that a majority of the popular vote of New Jersey was given to the five gentlemen who came here as Representatives from that State who have not the certificates of the Governor? Had not the Governor of New Jersey himself admitted this in his several messages?

Mr. GRAVES rose to a question of order. The gentlemen was debating the merits of the question as to the elections in New Jersey, which was not before the House.

Mr. T. said that, if the gentleman would permit him to go on, he would show that in the nature of the main question was to be found proof that the gentlemen are interested in the decision of the question now before us, and are, therefore, under the rule, precluded from voting. I put it to this House, Mr. T. said, if we have not before us facts which should make us all pause if we would do justice. I would give the seats to neither party for the present. But have we not the evidence of the Governor himself, that the five gentlemen to whom he gave his certificates did not, and that the other five gentlemen did, receive a majority of the popular vote? Did not the Governor, in the labored argument he made on the occasion, express his regret that the technicalities of the New Jersey laws prohibited him from doing justice to the gentlemen who had a majority of the popular vote, and console himself with the belief that the Congress of the United States, who would be bound by no such restrictions, would, on hearing the evidence, award to them their seats? Besides this evidence of the Governor of New Jersey himself, what other testimony is before us entitled to consideration? We have the certificate of the Secretary of State of New Jersey, verified by the broad seal of the State, that he has in his office a file of the original poll books of the elections, by which it appears that these same gentlemen, whom this House is called on to exclude, received a majority of the popular vote.

Mr. T. said he knew that it had been averred that illegal votes were given in the two election districts, the returns of which were suppressed, which, if deducted from the whole number of votes given, would leave a majority of votes in favor of those to whom the Governor awarded the certificates. But, said Mr. T. the Governor himself, in the statement he has given, never said one word about illegal votes, and that is not now the question before the House. We are not now about to decide upon the elections; we are about to decide on the returns. Before the final question as to illegal voting is determined, we must elect our officers, that we may conveniently collect testimony.

How do I, asked Mr. T. connect these remarks with the question of order? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has offered a resolution that five of the claimants from New Jersey shall be treated as members. This resolution the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] moved to be laid on the table. The motion for laying the resolution on the table is, in effect, as much a motion to reject it as it would be if we had the proposition itself directly before the House on its adoption. All these rights, arising from an occupancy of seats on this floor, are, therefore, involved in this question. What are those rights? A member of Congress has certain personal privileges, and when he has taken his seat he has those personal rights to protect, as well as his political rights, which he shares with his constituents. He need not dwell to enumerate those personal rights. They would occur readily to every intelligent person. They were, privilege from arrest for debts, title, pay, and others of like character, all of which were valuable and protected by law. And yet gentlemen not only contend that these rights and privileges shall be secured to the parties by their own votes in the first instance, but they tell us, that when once sworn in, these Jersey candidates are to assume such a position as to maintain their seats, by their own votes throughout the session. No one gentleman is to vote in his own case. But four of the New Jersey members might vote upon the case of one of them as it arises, and thus they are to elect a Speaker and other officers, and afterwards reject or pass all the measures we are to have before us. A more monstrous doctrine he never before heard advanced. Mr. T. here alluded to the declarations made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] and said it gave him pleasure to hear that gentleman declare, that delicacy, as well as the feelings of a man of honor, would prevent him from voting under these circumstances, although he believed that the rule, strictly construed, did not forbid it.

Mr. T. asked if any members could take the Speaker's chair with that generous exultation which ought to be felt by any one called to preside over such a body, if elected to it by such means. I must protest, Mr. T. said, that the Chairman, (for whom I must always manifest personal respect,) has usurped power in this instance that does not belong to his office. He has undertaken to draw his question within the vortex of order, and to decide that which the House itself only can decide; he has undertaken to throw the weight of his character in the scale against us, and to determine who shall be allowed to vote as members of this House. In conclusion, Mr. T. invited the members to read the rule, and have the facts in view. The facts are, that five gentlemen from New Jersey claim seats on this floor, under the same evidence, and the CHAIR decides that they can not only vote for each other, but that each can vote for himself. The rule is, that "no member shall vote on any question, in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested. Now, if these gentlemen have not an immediate, a particular, and personal interest in obtaining seats on this floor, then he could not conceive of a case to which the rule would apply. He was in favor of requiring all the claimants from New Jersey to stand aside, as in such cases has always been done in the House of Commons in England, till the questions are decided in which they are particularly concerned.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he had not risen to make a speech, but simply for the purpose of recalling the attention of the House to the question presented, and which, if he understood it, was in the following shape:

A gentleman was asked by one of the tellers appointed by the CHAIRMAN to take the vote, who were authorized to be counted? The CHAIRMAN decided that the members holding the legal certificates were entitled to vote; and, from this decision, an appeal was taken. The question was not, therefore, whether these gentlemen would or would not exercise that right. The only question was, is the decision of the CHAIR correct? Had the CHAIRMAN a right to decide who were entitled to vote? How, then, was this question presented? Upon the one side (continued Mr. H.) you are to determine that the sovereign State of New Jersey shall be disfranchised, and no one shall vote; or, on the other, if she was entitled to a vote of six Representatives, who shall give that vote—those holding the certificates drawn up with all the regular forms according to the law of that State and the Constitution of the United States, or those who presented a certificate signed by an officer without power and authority to give it, and which, as yet, is unbacked by testimony? That was the question presented to you. Could you, or any other man, have decided between these two questions otherwise than as you did decide? And the question now is, was that decision correct?

The gentleman from Virginia has said that this question should be postponed until we had heard the testimony—that it is enough that the seat is contested, to deprive the State of New Jersey of her Representatives. I answer, that if the mere fact of a seat being contested is to deprive New Jersey of five of her Representatives, then that contest has, before it is decided, all the power and omnipotence of a judgment, and you do as much wrong to the Representatives of a free State, or to the free State itself, by depriving them of their seat for one instant, as if you deprive them of it for a whole year. Yet, says the gentleman, wait till we have the testimony, and then we can judge; and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] in the very next breath, says you cannot determine that question until affidavits were taken, and the poll-books and the witnesses examined. Before whom? Before this House? Are we in a situation to read, digest, and properly to note the discordant testimony which may be given? Are we in a situation to examine witnesses at this bar? If that is true, then forever banish your Committee of Elections, for such a committee must for all future time be unnecessary. The House, at the commencement of every session, must sit here month after month, or at least until every disputed question of election can be settled, before it can be organized. It is fair and honest, says the gentleman from Maryland, that this should be done. I feel myself unable to compete with that gentleman in force of argument or power of language, but he will permit me to reply in language so much stronger and better than I could use, that it must carry conviction to my mind, at least, and probably to the minds of all the members of this House. I read, therefore, as part of my remarks, the following words, inserting only the words "New Jersey" instead of "Mississippi:"

"One of the members elect from Mississippi has already told you he will repair to the table to be sworn. And in this he is right. Who shall infringe the principles for which he contends? He is one of the chosen Representatives of the people of Mississippi. He has with him a certificate of election signed by the Governor of that State. He appears here, with his colleague, with the same power to take his seat that we each have. And they have as much authority to question our right to be sworn as we have to dispute theirs."

Is not this conclusive? (continued Mr. H.) If the language itself is not so, I will give the name of the gentleman who uttered it. It is the language of the honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] who has just addressed the House. He it is who thus put his foot down, and stood upon the certificate issued by the Governor, and fearlessly and triumphantly demanded who dared infringe that right. I take the extract of the report of a speech made by that gentleman in the case of Claiborne and Gholson, as published in the Globe, and I take it therefore to be correct.

Mr. THOMAS asked leave to explain. And Mr HOFFMAN having yielded the floor for that purpose,

Mr. T. said that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] certainly did injustice to himself in adopting his speech as an argument. He was sure Mr. H. could make a much abler argument than any he could find in his (Mr. T.'s) speeches.

The character of the remarks referred to was that of enumeration; he was enumerating the causes why those gentlemen were entitled to their seats, and the most paramount of them all was, that they were the chosen Representatives of the people of Mississippi. They came here with commissions from the Governor of that State, and then there were no claimants. Such was not the fact here. The remarks which had been read had been delivered at the special session.

Mr. HOFFMAN continued. I have alluded to this speech in no spirit of unkindness. I did so because I was well aware that any language which that gentleman used would have weight with one portion of the House, at least, for its orthodoxy, and that it would have weight with another portion of the House for the apparent candor and sincerity which mark all he says. But even with the explanation which he has given, I understand that the one reason he assigned was, (and here, he says, lies the difference between that case and the present,) that these men for whom he contended were the chosen Representatives of the people. That was the foundation of his speech. But what evidence had he that they were so? Did it not come back to the very evidence offered by him that the gentlemen claiming to be sworn "had the certificate of election signed by the Governor of the State?" They were chosen Representatives—they had the certificate, which was evidence that they were chosen; and, having proved by that certificate that they were so, he asks, "Who are you who dare dispute this right? How dare you question my certificate, given under authority as great and solemn as your own?" Does the gentleman remember that the very foundation of his argument proved to have been laid in the sand? for that very House determined that they were not the chosen Representatives of the people, and sent them home to pass again through all the forms of election.

[It was here suggested to Mr. HOFFMAN that this took place at the second election for members for Mississippi.]

Mr. THOMAS said there were two elections held—one preceding the extra session, and one succeeding it. At the extra session the seats were given to these two gentlemen.

Mr. HOFFMAN said, probably the gentleman was right.

Several expressions fell from members in different parts of the Hall, which the Reporter could not hear distinctly.

When Mr. H. proceeded.

The argument is strong enough without stating any thing that is incorrect. My recollection is, that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson presented themselves at the bar by virtue of a special election—that, after that, a new election was held, and that, at the second election, treating the first one as void, Messrs. Prentiss and Word were elected. When the latter gentlemen presented themselves here to claim their seats, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson contended that their election for the extra term was good for the whole term. The question came before the House. The House determined that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson were not elected, and finally sent them home for re-election. I believe that to be the fact. The House determined that they were not the chosen Representatives of the people, and sent them home. But, be that as it may, does not the whole argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] go upon the ground that the certificate of the Governor showed that they were the chosen Representatives of the people of Mississippi, and that they had a right to ask the boldest of their opponents—what right have you, holding a certificate no greater than mine, to dispute my seat? Are you a member? So am I. Have you a certificate? So have I. Is yours a sovereign and an independent State? So is mine. Has your State spoken through the channels which she herself has pointed out? So has mine. And what right have you to send me home, who come here under the authority of a State of equal sovereignty—a State as independent, as proud, and as gallant as your own? This, sir, is the argument of the gentleman from Maryland; and whatever may have been the subsequent termination of the matter, it cannot take away one iota from the power and the conclusiveness with which it was then urged. But does not the gentleman from Virginia see that this question is to be never ending: that witnesses are to be examined: that months and months may be consumed, if we depart from established precedents for a moment, and refuse to stand by the certificate? That must be our rule of conduct, and by that alone we must abide.

This case I liken to the case of the judment of a State court, as conclusive and binding until that judgment be reversed or repealed by a court having appellate jurisdiction. Every act under that judgment, until it is reversed, is binding. Execution issued to a sheriff must be served—and execution at his peril. Is there an appellate court here? There is. That appellate court is the Congress of the United States; and when we are organized—when the chief justice has taken his seat—when the case is called, and the testimony and arguments shall have been heard, the judgment of the State court may be affirmed or reversed; but until then it is binding and conclusive.

Without going further into this matter, let me allude to an expression which fell from my colleague, [Mr VANDERPOEL.] I allude to it more in sorrow than in anger; and I could not but regret, sir, when you had taken that seat by the unanimous voice, almost, of this House—when you had been called, in the midst of our confusion, from the weight of your character, and the sanctity of your years, to produce order out of riot—I say I could not but regret that the decision of such a man should have been pronounced, by one so much younger, so much less entitled to respect from all that influence which the fruits of experience can give, a monstrous assumption, a monstrous usurpation. Let me say to the gentleman, sir, that your character is one of a purity and integrity so spotless, that it has passed even through the fiery ordeal of party conflict and party bitterness without a stain. The offices you have held have added no lustre to your character, which your character has not reflected back upon them; and when I find my colleague assailing a man to whom history at least will do justice—a man whose character and virtues have illumined some of its brightest pages—when I find such a man, living before my colleague was a boy, and mixing up with the great affairs of a young and infant nation before he drew breath, thus assailed, I cannot but regret that such expressions should fall from a friend and colleague of mine; and I will only say, that when the sender strikes a ball against such a man and such a character, he ought to be sure that there will not be a rebound that will strike the sender.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, he had tried to get the floor immediately after his colleague [Mr. GRANGER] had closed, but other gentlemen of more agility than he possessed, anticipated him. He did not know why his two colleagues [Messrs. GRANGER and HOFFMAN] had made him so prominent a subject in the discourses with which they had just edified us. He had, to be sure, had the temerity to appeal from the decision, and as he conceived it, the most extraordinary decision of the CHAIR, and he also had the further temerity to say, that it was founded in usurpation; and this had furnished his colleague [Mr. HOFFMAN] an occasion for treating us with one of those sweet, pretty, and touching eulogisms upon the CHAIRMAN, for which his friend and colleague was so eminently qualified. He (Mr. V.) would, upon the present occasion, neither assent to, or dissent from, this most encomiastic picture, drawn in the presence and hearing of the CHAIRMAN himself, nor would he here stop to inquire whether the gentleman had or had not violated the laws of good taste in lavishing such high-wrought praise in the presence and hearing of the subject of it; but he would at once reiterate what he had before said, that the CHAIRMAN, under pretence of deciding a question of order, had decided a most momentous question of right; and he would not be deterred by any false or mistaken delicacy—any affected reverence for gray hairs—from characterizing the act as he thought it deserved. He had not impeached—he did not intend to impeach—the motives of the CHAIRMAN; but he would again pronounce the decision, in effect, a most decided usurpation. It was so, because he had assumed jurisdiction that did not belong to him, and which the mover of the resolution that had given the CHAIRMAN that place, never supposed to belong to him when he moved that he should preside over our deliberations. It was so, because the simple ipse dixit of the CHAIR, if not reversed, would give five members a seat upon this floor whose right to seats had formed the subject of conflict here for the last five days. We were not dealing with trifles. When the rights of the people of a sovereign State were involved, and attempted to be trodden under foot, he would speak of it boldly and freely as he thought it deserved. If the CHAIR had transcended his jurisdiction, and thus prostrated the expressed will of a majority of the people of a sovereign State, he would not ransack his lexicon for very mild terms in order to give a mitigated aspect to an act pregnant with such serious and mischievous consequences.

He would now pay his passing respects to that colleague [Mr. GRANGER] who had done him the honor of making him the subject of so great a portion of his remarks. For all the purposes of the question immediately under discussion, his colleague might as well have read a chapter from Don Quixote; for that would have been quite as relevant to the point under debate as were most of his remarks. His colleague was disposed to make merry with what he evidently deemed his (Mr. V's) pretended love for the people; with his professed respect for the sovereignty and majesty of the people. Mr. V. said, humble as he was, he and his doings had been most conspicuously, if not unkindly, forced into this debate, and he could therefore, averse as he generally was to such a course, speak of himself without exposing himself to the imputation of egotism. He would, therefore, by way of repelling the inference that his advocacy of popular rights was insincere, tell the House that the kindness he had so repeatedly received at the hands of the people, gave him abundant cause to love them. Five times had they chosen him to honorable and responsible stations, and never yet had they rejected him. He could, however, imagine a case, where frequent disappointment, frequent frustration of fond hopes and bright visions, might possibly inspire any thing but affection for popular rights. If a gentleman of high ambition, and with aspirations at least as lofty as his legitimate pretensions, should happen to be twice presented to the people of his State for the highest trust and honor in their gift, and they should reject him, as they would the unclean thing; if he should hazard another struggle for the second office in this great Confederacy of free States, and a similar fate should attend his third ambitious effort, he would not wonder if, with such a one, affection for the people and regard for popular rights should become subjects of derision and merriment. This would accord with the dictates of poor, frail, unforgiving human nature. The poet understood this sentiment, and expresses it most pithily when he asks,

> "What rogue e'er felt the halter draw
> With good opinion of the law!"

He surely did not consider the two first words of the couplet as at all applicable to his colleague. Those who knew their friendly personal relations, would never draw such an inference. But his colleague had also referred us to the case from New York, which occurred some twenty-six years ago, (he meant the case of Peter Allen,) and had undertaken to give us not only a minute account of that case, but volunteered to us the information, that the year next succeeding the ejection of Mr. Allen from the New York Legislature, he was elected by a decided majority of the county of Ontario, and that my colleague, then acting with the Democratic party, had aided in producing this result. Mr. V. said he knew nothing of that case, except as matter of history, for when it occurred, he had scarcely entered his teens, and he therefore spoke with much deference to the recollection of his venerable colleague, who had told us that he was one of the adult and efficient actors of the scenes of that early day. He was sorry, situated as his colleague was, that he had furnished him with an occasion to denominate him so "venerable" in the presence, and hearing of that gallery, (pointing to the ladies' gallery,) for whose special edification most of the observations of the gentleman were so evidently designed. He would tell the gentleman and the House, that in that case, there was no question arising upon the returns. Mr. Fellows came in there by petition, and the House decided that they would not entertain the petition till the Speaker was chosen, and the House was organized. Besides, sir, in New York the members are sworn by the Chancellor, or Secretary of State, before the Speaker is chosen. Mr. Allen had the certificate—he was sworn as a member before the House could act upon the case, and, as such, voted for the council of appointment before he was ejected. But does the gentleman recollect how loudly and how unsparingly that act of the House of Assembly was denounced by the party with which he is now associated? Sir, look at the leading New York Federal journals of that day, and you will see that they were actually, in token of their abhorrence of this deed, dated from the reign of Peter Allen. Thus, for example: "THE THIRD, FOURTH, OR FIFTH MONTH OF THE REIGN OF PETER ALLEN." It had been stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] that Mr. Van Buren was then Attorney General of New York, and had given an official opinion in favor of this procedure.

[Mr. WISE here explained, and said that Mr. V. had misunderstood him; that he had said that Mr. Van Buren had approved of it; but he did not say that he had done so in his official capacity.]

If that case was sanctioned by one party, it was condemned by the other party, with which his colleague now acted. The argument resulting from this case was, therefore, neutralized; and he would therefore dismiss it, with the old maxim, that "two wrongs could not make one right."

He had said that the CHAIRMAN had exceeded his power in deciding that the five gentlemen from New Jersey who had the Governor's certificate had the right to vote upon the present occasion. This House had organized in this unprecedented manner, as he understood, for the very purpose of determining this point, and now the CHAIR very kindly interfered, and relieved it of its appropriate functions. It was that the House might be placed in a position to act and decide this very question, that we departed from the usage that has always obtained in organizing this body; and now, forsooth, we are told that the House cannot act upon this matter, but that it legitimately belongs to the CHAIR to decide who are, and who are not, members of this House. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had urged that there could be no usurpation whenever the law of necessity called for the exercise of a power. He denied that the CHAIR could derive any justification from the law of necessity. It was not now necessary that the CHAIR should arrogate to itself this high power. Our situation had changed. Our paralysis was now cured, and the House was competent to act. The CLERK decided, when we were under his auspices, that there being no quorum called, he could not put a question; but now we were relieved from that difficulty. Questions could now be put, and there was now a court convened with competent power to try the question that had been so long agitated. It was not necessary, nay, it was monstrous, that the mere judge of order, which this body had created, should draw within the vortex of order such high and momentous questions of right. He repeated that the CHAIR, in the name of order, had decided a great question of right—the right to a seat upon this floor; one of the higest objects of laudable ambition. He had decided it too, as Mr. V. considered, in the very teeth of one of the standing rules of this House, which we had adopted to govern our deliberations. He meant the rule which had already been referred to, and which provided that "no member shall vote upon any question, in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested. The CHAIR decided that the Governor's members from New Jersey were not interested in the question within the contemplation of the rule; that the interest was that of the constituent, and not of the Representative. He denied the proposition, that the gentlemen whom the CHAIR had adjudged competent to vote, had no interest in the question upon which the vote was to be taken. Their interest was immediate and most palpable. What was the motion upon which they were to vote? It was to lay upon the table a resolution that they should be called and recognised as members of this House; upon this question it was, that the CHAIR had decided that these gentlemen could vote. The moment they voted in pursuance of the decision, what were they? They were to all intents and purposes members of the House. And what benefits did they derive from that character? They were clearly entitled to their mileage and per diem, amounting to some two or three hundred dollars each. They had a right to go to the Speaker, the moment he was chosen, and ask his warrant for their pay, and he would not and could not refuse to grant it to them. This they could not do, if ordered to stand back, as others proposed they should be. Here there was a direct pecuniary interest in the question; and was there a mind here, unclouded by prejudice, that did not see it? But this was not all. They would derive from the decision of the CHAIR other great privileges and immunities. That clause of the Constitution which provides "that Representatives in Congress shall, during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to or returning from the same, be privileged from arrest," surely conferred a high privilege upon the members of this House. If the Governor's members (he used this designation in contradistinction to those chosen by the people) should be permitted to vote, and thus be recognised as members, was it not most clear that it would be competent for them to avail themselves of this clause of the Constitution? So long as they were not recognised by this House, but kept in suspense, their creditors, who might see fit to arrest them, could reply that they were not members of this House, and thus defeat the enjoyment of this high privilege. But this was not all. Not only did the character of member of this House confer high privileges, but it also created disabilities. Another clause of the Constitution provided that "no Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time." The decision of the CHAIR would determine whether this disability was, or was not, created; and here was another feature of interest. View it in whatever aspect you please, and you perceive, in the breast of the Governor's members, a direct interest in the event of this question—an interest coming not only within the spirit, but the letter of the rule. He could have hoped that delicacy would have been a motive strong enough to have prevented these gentlemen from voting. The force of this sentiment, however, depended so much upon the anxieties, the temperament, the passions, and prejudices of men, that it was not always safe to calculate upon its restraining efficacy. He had not the most satisfactory pledge that it would be a very potent sentiment in this case.

Mr. BIDDLE said that an effort had been made, day after day, to fix upon the Opposition the odium of the delay which had attended the organization of the House. Doubtless there would be a heavy responsibility before the people on those to whom the delay could be fairly attributed. Here had been a mass of men, called to a high trust, struggling to take a form appropriate to legislative action, without a presiding officer authorized to enforce order, and, indeed, without any established rules of order to be enforced. We had been preserved from disreputable scenes only by the general sense of what was due to the character of the country, and by the spirit of forbearance and courtesy which he was happy to see had been brought here from all quarters. The events of yesterday, Mr. B. thought, would sufficiently relieve his political friends from the reproaches which had been so perseveringly cast upon them. The difficulty into which we had been thrown by the CLERK, or his advisers, by his unprecedented course, and the dogged adherence to that course, was, at length, overcome, Mr. CHAIRMAN, by your appointment. This step was taken and justified by the instinct of self-preservation. We were about to die of an abstraction. We have been rescued from this danger. The first manly movement proved that the fetters of steel supposed to be around us were mere cobwebs.

Standing, then, at the very point which we occupied on Monday, at noon, Mr. B. said he was anxious that the eye of the country should be kept steadily fixed on every step of our progress.

At the first moment after we asserted the power of action, by placing you in the Chair, a motion was submitted which required the acting CLERK to call the names of all whose credentials conformed to the laws of their respective States. This motion brought up distinctly the question, whether we should adhere to established and unbroken usage. It proposed to do what the CLERK should have done originally, and what he had always done heretofore. It assumed the principle that the credentials referred to constituted per se a right on the part of a Representative of the people to take a place amongst those who could themselves pretend to no higher badge of authenticity; and that, at this stage of organization, we must, of necessity, look with deference, and not in a spirit of sharp criticism, to that ostensible right which all brought here alike.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] has moved to lay this resolution on the table with a view to introduce again some one of the various schemes that have led us a chase for four entire days. If Mr. B. understood him aright, he intended to move that the "disputed members" should be passed over and a quorum be formed without them.

This project was substantially the same as that offered on the first day of the session by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] It had fixed his (Mr. B.'s) attention at the time as one of engrossing interest, and preliminary in its character; and he had endeavored to claim for it the attention and decision of the House. But, amidst the medley of topics which were thrown into the debate, in the absence of all rules of order, it had been lost sight of, or only reappeared occasionally when pure weariness of a desultory and seemingly endless debate led to an impatience for something like method, and an eager desire to escape by any avenue from the labyrinth in which we were involved.

The project was one which had a show of plausibility about it, and addressed itself favorably to those who were anxious to get rid of this unpleasant matter as speedily as possible.

But, Mr. CHAIRMAN, in our eagerness to escape, we must not leave behind us a precedent fraught with mischiefs far greater than any temporary embarrassment. The present posture of affairs is one which must recur at the commencement of every future Congress. It is not a matter which passes off and terminates in itself. We cannot escape responsibility to those who come after us and to the country. What we do is for good or evil hereafter. The great outline of proceeding now adopted will be looked to by our successors, when the spirit of compromise and the pledges of forbearance that accompanied it shall have been forgotten.

In considering the merits of this scheme, I must assume that, in practice, the task of deciding upon and announcing the disputed and undisputed members will be exercised by the CLERK, as has been done at the present session. We are now to take up and adopt his proscribed list. We have nothing else before us to indicate a dispute; and the late movement did not, as I understand it, proceed on the ground of disapprobation of this part of his conduct. What, then, is substantially the lesson to be drawn from our proceedings? The CLERK, having announced the name of one Representative from New Jersey, withholds the names of the other five, on the ground that their seats are contested. Of the nature of the contest we officially know nothing. It is proposed now that we acquiesce in this proceeding of the CLERK without further question; that he shall proceed with the list, and, whenever he chooses to say that a dispute exists, he is to drop the whole or a part of any given delegation. Those who may remain, after this arbitrary and uncontrolled process of expurgation by the CLERK, are to sit in judgment on the rest, taking up the cases seriatim, and excluding from the judicial function all those who have been ordered by the CLERK to stand aside as disputed.

Sir, is not the bare statement of the proposition enough to show that it cannot be a safe and practicable one? A Clerk, whose own re-election depends on the composition of the House, at a given moment is made absolute and uncontrolled master over that composition! He has only to assert that the seats of his opponents, or some of them, are disputed, in order to insure a majority of those who, he knows, will vote for him, and for a Speaker of the same party. It is optional with these men, when once seated as a quorum, to act as they please. They have the power; and who can say that it will not be exercised? I am far from supposing that any gentleman would be wilfully perfidious to the pledge of moderation and forbearance that seems to be loosely passing round. But the very necessity for these pledges shows that the rule cannot work well in practice. It is our own off-spring, and we may be willing to conceal its deformities; but the next Congress will find this on record as the process ready prepared to their hands, and they will be disengaged from pledges. The unlimited control must, of necessity, be given to the party having an influence over the CLERK, and that control may be perpetrated in infinitum, because we know that contests may be started up at an hour's notice. Besides, sir, who has a right to give pledges on the subject? Who has a right to place the exercise of his legislative functions at the chance of this lottery? And what is the nature of the pledge? That we will not elect a Speaker or transact business until these disputed cases are settled? Is this the pledge? And where is it to lead us? We have already heard it announced by gentlemen on this floor, in swelling terms, that they are not going to yield to forms and technicalities—to the broad seals of States, or the certificates of Governors—that they will not be satisfied without probing this matter to the bottom, and ascertaining whether Governor Pennington has practised a fraud on the people of New Jersey. Indeed! And so, sir, we are pledged to abandon the duties of legislation, to remain here in our respective parts of judges and suitors, as the CLERK shall arrange us, until materials shall be collected to pass on the alleged misdeeds of Governor Pennington.

But suppose, Mr. CHAIRMAN, there should not be a quorum of undisputed seats? Nobody knows, at present, how many seats are disputed. That knowledge rests exclusively with the CLERK. He is to say whether I, for example, am to act as a judge over others, or am myself to be put upon trial. Every one waits in breathless anxiety to know his fate. And if any advantage can be drawn from a dispute, will not one be trumped as a matter of course? The question will be, in each district, not why a dispute should be raised, but why a dispute should not be raised; it will serve to justify a wrangle, and in high party times any shallow pretext may be laid hold of; it will, at least, provide a set-off to some dispute on the other side equally frivolous. No man ever failed at a popular election, without believing himself very ill used, and he is in a mood to listen with eagerness to representations which tend, at least, to break the first chagrin of disappointment, and soothe the smarting wounds of vanity. If, then, a majority of cases be disputed, we are absolutely at the end of this contrivance—this wretched makeshift. You have renounced and brought into discredit the only safe and practicable rule. It will, at least, labor under the disadvantage of having been, during one Congress, decried and overruled. Can you expect to lift it from disgrace, and restore it to favor, in the face, not only of eager passions and importunate interests, but of your own fatal example?

What was the new code of evidence which gentlemen sought to introduce here? The prima facie positive, under the great seal of a State, in all the forms of authentication, was sneered it—it was to go for nothing; but the prima facie negative of a CLERK's breath was potent enough to disfranchise a great Commonwealth! The laws of New Jersey on this subject formed a part of the Constitution of the United States. That instrument referred to and adopted the State laws, which thus acquired as high a sanction as if they had been incorporated into it in 1787. The oath to support the Constitution reached to, and comprehended, those laws.

It seems to be conceded that the course proposed was in defiance of all usage in our own country, but an intimation had been thrown out in various quarters that the practice of the House of Commons lent a sanction to it.

[Mr. B. here appealed to Mr. THOMAS, Mr. VANDERPOEL, and Mr. RHETT to know distinctly if they so contended. These gentlemen were understood to disclaim any special familiarity with the subject, but to have stated their general impressions.]

Mr. B. said he had put the question in all courtesy and respect, with a view to know how far his own recollection was at variance with that of others. He had no doubt that the usage there was precisely the same as here. There could be no other rule that would enable such a body as the House of Commons to get to the despatch of business. During the discussion, he had sent to the library for one of the popular Digests, supposing that a reference to the point might be found. The work he held in his hand was of no great authority, but, perhaps, best suited the purpose, as likely to contain only what was familiar and well settled. He then read from Jacob's Law Dictionary, (title Parliament:)

"When the right of election is doubtful, and consequently it is uncertain that candidates are duly elected, the returning officer may, and for his own safety ought to, make a double return. But this must be done upon the returning officer's own judgment, not upon the agreement of the parties. If two or more sets of electors make each a return of a different member, (which is called a double election,) that return only which the returning officer to whom the sheriff's precept was directed has signed and sealed, is good. And the members by him returned shall sit until displaced on petition — Sim. 134. By the Irish act, 35 Geo. 3, c. 29, the returning officer (even though not otherwise qualified to vote) must, in case of an equality of votes at the poll, give his casting vote and make a return."

Here, then, was the rule, (and no other could ever be carried out,) that the right to sit of the individual coming within the requisitions of the law must, in the first instance, be deemed conclusive. Such had been the doctrine triumphantly carried out by the present Chief Magistrate in the case which arose in New York—a case to which his friends in this House had not attempted to make a reply. Mr. B. said he did not refer to the principles on which, in England, the ultimate right was settled on a petition to the House. They turned on the Grenville act and other subsequent statutes, all of which were incorporated into one in 1828. Those principles were substantially the same as in our own country.

But the question might be asked, If the majority refuse to act on the old usage, what is to be done? Must there not be a compromise? Must we not yield to some scheme by which one portion of the House shall, at hap-hazard, be constituted judges over the other portion? Each one must answer these questions for himself. Mr. B was not tenacious about small matters; but here, in his opinion, was a course proposed that struck at a principle on the sacred observance of which, in sincerity and good faith, must depend the future organization of this House in times of deep party excitement. He could not compromise, however he might be overruled. Doubtless a majority might insist on any proposition, however absurd, and whatever impediment it placed in the way of the rightful action of the Government. It might refuse to receive a message from the Senate until the credentials of that body were explored and the allegations of opposing claimants fully considered and passed upon. It might refuse to receive the President's message on some similar allegation. Would the Senate or President proffer terms of compromise? Mr. B. said he could not suffer himself to be jaded into an abandonment of what he deemed a matter of vital interest.

Mr. B. referred to the charge of usurpation, which had been urged against the CHAIRMAN for making a decision when called upon. What was he to do? Refuse to act? Take a leaf out of the CLERK's book? The result would be that the House must have driven him out of the Chair in order to place there somebody who would go through this very act of "usurpation," and thus put the question in a train for settlement.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, rose and asked the CLERK of the House to state what was the decision of the CHAIR from which an appeal had been taken.

[The CLERK here read the resolution of Mr. WISE, of Virginia, as follows:

Resolved, That the Acting Clerk of this House shall proceed with the call of the members from the different States of the Union in the usual way, calling the names of such members from New Jersey as hold the regular and legal commissions from the Executive of that State.

And then the following resolution, which Mr. RHETT, of South Carolina, offered as a substitute:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested; and after the names of such members are called, and before a Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of all claimants to seats contested on this floor.

The CLERK then stated that Mr. RHETT moved to lay the resolution of Mr. WISE upon the table with a view to offer his resolution as a substitute; and upon the question of laying Mr. WISE's resolution upon the table, tellers were called. Mr. DROMGOOLE, of Virginia, being one of the tellers appointed by the CHAIR, the question being about to be put upon the adoption of the resolution of Mr. RHETT, rose and observed to the CHAIR, that he had been appointed by the CHAIR to act as one of the tellers, and was ready to discharge the duty assigned him, but desired to be instructed by the CHAIR how he was to perform it. The CHAIR replied that he conceived the rule to be that such persons as possessed commissions in conformity with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey were entitled to vote as members of the House, and that no others were entitled; and from this decision of the CHAIR, Mr. VANDERPOEL, of New York, appealed to the House.]

Mr. WHITE then said: Mr. CHAIRMAN, forgiving this decision, you have been charged with being guilty of an act of usurpation. Sir, the appetite for denunciation did not stop here. The honorable member from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] denounced your decision as a gross usurpation. And another honorable member from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] followed suit, and characterized your decision as an act of monstrous usurpation. Mr. WHITE (addressing himself to the CHAIR) said, if it be true you have been guilty of the high offence with which you stand charged, neither the courtesy of debate, the sanctity of the exalted station you now fill as presiding officer of this House—no, sir, nor even your gray hairs, should screen you from the odium due to the usurper and the despot. But, sir, if it shall turn out, upon a fair investigation of the question, that the decision of the CHAIR is in strict conformity to the Constitution, to law, to all past parliamentary usage in this country, as well as in all other civilized countries, what should be the sentence pronounced upon your accusers? Sir, the undivided execrations of mankind should be thundered in their ears.

Mr. W. contended that the CHAIR was perfectly justifiable in declaring the opinion from which the appeal was taken—he had no alternative left him but to decide, or shrink from a discharge of his duty. The question remains, did he decide right? Mr. W. remarked that, before he went into the argument upon the correctness of the opinion of the CHAIR upon principle, and upon usage and precedent, he would call the attention of the House, and particularly the attention of the member from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] and the member from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] to an authority in support of the decision of the CHAIR, that he knew would not be controverted by either of the honorable gentlemen; and out of your own mouths, said Mr. W. I will convict you.

Mr. W. then proceeded to read from the speech of Mr. VANDERPOEL, of New York, delivered in the case of the contested election of Moore and Letcher in the year 1834. Mr W. asserted that the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] in that debate, ably and eloquently maintained the precise doctrine contained in the decision of the CHAIR, and the very opposite doctrine now so vehemently contended for by the gentleman. In that debate the gentleman held the following language:

"No, sir, I go for the laws and the Constitution —whether they define the qualifications of the voter, or prescribe the manner in which this right shall be exercised. I cannot here be persuaded either to jump over the Constitution or crawl under the law, by the captivating doctrine that the right of suffrage is paramount to the law and the Constitution. Sir, I know not whence we derive equitable powers so transcendent as those which I have here, to my very great surpise, heard claimed for us—powers which enable us to set the laws and the Constitution at defiance, and authorize us here, in a judicial capacity, to exercise the despot's prerogative—to dispense justice according to our abstract notions of right and wrong. Sir, will not this lead to a perfect mobocracy? Sir, I had always supposed that all legal ends in civilized communities, and under free and constitutional Governments, were to be obtained by lawful and constitutional means; and that it is better, far better, that the end should sometimes be lost, than adopt the more than Vandal heresy, that the 'end justifies the means.'"

This, Mr. W. charged, was the language of the eloquent gentleman upon that occasion, containing doctrines as sound as Holy Writ—the very doctrines of the decision of the CHAIR—doctrines that will stand the scrutiny of "talents and of time." In that debate the gentleman acknowledged himself the power of the Constitution; according to his political creed then, the law and the Constitution was supreme, and that right of suffrage itself was to be sacrificed if it came in conflict with the law of the State. But now, sir, Democracy and popular rights are paramount to law and the Constitution. Now, this same gentleman denounces this very doctrine as a "small, miserable, squeaking, technicality;" and those members who claim their seats from New Jersey, under the commission of the Governor, executed in strict conformity to the laws of that State, as "pretenders coming here under the cloak of a sheer bond." O! consistency, thou art a virtue! Mr. W. appealed to the gentleman now to justify his present course. He appealed to the good sense of every member in the House to decide whether the opinion given by the CHAIR was not fully and amply supported by the very extracts quoted from the speech of the gentleman in 1831. Mr. W. asked, what had brought so radical a change in the gentleman's political creed? Had his recent tour to Europe furnished him fresh light upon Democracy?

Mr. W. said, Mr. Chairman, I will now address myself for a short time to the honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS.] He asked the undivided attention of the gentleman from Maryland (who occupied a seat immediately in front of Mr. W.) whilst he read from an authority which he well knew that gentleman would recognise as sound doctrine, however much others might be disposed to controvert it. Mr. W. then proceeded to read from the speech of Mr. F. THOMAS, of Maryland, delivered at the late session of Congress, in the contested election of Claiborne and Gholson, the following extracts:

"When the Clerk had reached the names of the members elected from the State of Mississippi, one of them has already told you he would repair to the table to be sworn; and in this he is right. Who shall infringe the rights for which he contends? He is one of the chosen Representatives of the people of Mississippi. He has with him a certificate of election, signed by the Governor of that State. He appears here with his colleague with the same proof to take his seat that we each have. And they have the same authority to question our right as we have theirs. They have the unbroken custom for their guide; and no injustice can be done to any portion of the American people by a strict adherence to this wholesome and convenient usage."

Mr. W. remarked that, in that case, and upon that occasion, the Governor's certificate was conclusive to the gentleman's mind; so sacred, that no man should dare question the right of the member to qualify. Upon that occasion, the gentleman held usage and precedent in high estimation. Yes, sir, upon that occasion a "strict adherence to usage" was the orthodox doctrine. Now, sir, the honorable member (with what courtesy, what consistency, I leave to himself to determine) charges you with being guilty of an act of "monstrous usurpation," for deciding that the members holding the certificate of election, in conformity to the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of the respective States, are entitled to be recognised as members. Is this not strange, passing strange? No, sir; the case being altered, it alters the case. The sitting members, Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, were good Democrats; that being the case, usage and precedent were safe and wholesome guides.

Mr. W. said he would not consume the time of the House in commenting upon the flagrant absurdities and inconsistencies of the gentleman. He would simply say, O! shame, where is thy blush?

Mr. W. said he did not base the correctness of the decision of the CHAIR alone upon the high authorities from which he had read. He found higher authority—he looked to the Constitution of the United States, the Constitution of the State of New Jersey, and the laws of that Commonwealth. From these resources, Mr. W. contended, we obtained the rules by which we should be governed in deciding who were members upon this floor, either temporary or permanent. By the first, we are empowered to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of our members. By the second and third, the time, place and manner of holding the election are prescribed. The Constitution of the United States is the paramount law of the land, and no valid election can be held until the State Legislature has prescribed the rules by which it is to be governed. True, Congress has the power to alter these rules; but it must be done by law. This House cannot do it—no such inherent, omnipotent power belongs to us, as some gentlemen suppose, and have contended for. Until a law is passed by Congress, the law of the State must prevail.

Mr. W. contended it were worse than vain for gentlemen to talk here about "abstract rights" and "liberal principles" upon a question of Constitution, of law, and immemorial usage. It was ridiculous to hear honorable members denounce an adherence to well established precedent a "miserable technicality." Such doctrines lead to the overthrow of all order, the subversion of all government. Instead of a Government of laws, which should be the pride and boast of every patriot, we would sink into a wild and lawless anarchy. Let the principles contended for in this debate prevail, and the valued and established institutions of our country will be transformed into a "mobocracy."

Mr. W. maintained that the true issue before the House had been passed over and disregarded in this debate. It was not a question now, he contended, who was entitled to be permanent members of this House during this Congress from the State of New Jersey. That was a question that could not now arise, in the disorganized state of this body, there being nobody competent to decide that question until the House was duly organized and a Speaker chosen. The single isolated question to be decided at present was, who are to take their seats as temporary members to aid in the organization of the House? You, Mr. Chairman, have answered, and answered correctly—those individuals, and those only, who hold the certificates in due conformity to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the respective States. In deciding this, you do not undertake to settle who ultimately, upon an investigation of facts, will be entitled to permanent seats during the present Congress; nor does your decision affect that issue in the remotest degree when it shall arise. Mr. W. contended that the question of temporary right was one thing, and the permanent right a very different thing. Mr. W. remarked that it mattered not to him who obtained the temporary seat to aid in the organization of the House. When the question came to be tried upon its merits, he should vote to award the permanent seat to the individual who had the greatest number of qualified voters of his district or State, guided by such rules of testimony as the Legislature of New Jersey have enacted to determine upon the returns of her elections.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has been contended that your decision is in conflict with the usage of the English Parliament. This Mr. W. denied. In England, as in this country, he challenged the production of a single precedent, in the organization of a deliberative body, where the member holding the legal returns has been disqualified from acting in the organization of the House. Mr. W. said he would not weary the House by reading cases (which he could do almost without number) where the member holding the regular certificate had taken his seat in the organization of the House, although, in a great majority of the cases, upon an investigation of the merits, the returned member was ejected, and proved not to be the rightful member. Mr. W. then read from Blackstone's Commentaries, 1st volume, page 181: "The members of Parliament returned by the sheriffs are the sitting members until the House of Commons, upon petition, shall adjudge the return false and illegal." But, Mr. Chairman, it is contended that your decision is in conflict with that rule of the House which provides that "no member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested." Mr. W. contended this rule did not apply in the present case. True, the members claiming to vote had a partial interest in the question; but their constituents—the people of New Jersey—held the paramount interest in the case. It was not the case of the individuals; it was emphatically the case of the people of the State of New Jersey. Yes, sir, it is the right of the people of the State of New Jersey to representation upon this floor, that is at stake here. This is the great interest involved in the discussion of this question, and not the small rights of personal privilege and pecuniary compensation that may or may not attach to the individual members. Exclude these members, and you deprive the sovereign State of New Jersey of five-sixths of her representation upon this floor; and this is denominated true and genuine Democracy, and you are charged with being a "despot and usurper" for deciding otherwise.

Sir, the moment we abandon the law we are afloat upon the broad ocean of uncertainty. The States have the power to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding the elections; this power is expressly granted in the Federal Constitution, as already observed. The State of New Jersey, as well as all other States in this Union, has exercised this right, and defined the rules of making returns of her members to Congress. To disregard the law of the State, and confirm or reject credentials upon our own ideas of right and justice, would be the very thing the honorable members from New York and Maryland [Messrs. VANDERPOEL and F. THOMAS] have charged upon you—a most flagrant act of usurpation. Sir, said Mr. W. we may talk of "State Rights," of "Popular Rights," of "Special Pleading," of "Squeaking Technicalities;" but if we disregard the laws of the States, enacted upon a subject expressly reserved for their legislation, and substitute our own will for their solemn statutes, he boldly asserted we will have established a principle that will sap the very foundation of State sovereignty, the last vestige of liberty reserved to the members of this Confederacy. Such a principle carried out must lead to the concentration of all power in the General Government. It would override all the barriers erected in the Constitution between the Central Government and the rights of the several States, and would ultimately end in absolute despotism.

Mr. DUNCAN observed that he understood yesterday, that after the appointment of a chairman, the rules of the last House of Representatives were adopted for the government of this House for the time being. One of these rules required that the yeas and nays should be called alphabetically. Now he wished to know of the CHAIR if the yeas and nays would be called if demanded, and how?

The CHAIR stated that the rule did not apply, because the organization of the House was not completed. The yeas and nays, therefore, could not be called.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then rose and gave notice that, in case such a decision should be made in the very teeth of the Constitution, which requires that the yeas and nays shall be called when desired by one-fifth of the members present, he should take an appeal from it.

Mr. DUNCAN then asked if there was not a rule of the last House of Representatives which prohibited a member from voting "on any question in which he is immediately and personally interested," and if this rule, in the opinion of the CHAIR, did not apply to the persons claiming seats as Representatives from New Jersey.

The CHAIR decided that the five members from New Jersey, who were commissioned by the Governor, were not prohibited from voting under that rule. They themselves were not immediately and personally interested; it was their constituents only who were interested.

Mr. DUNCAN then observed, that if these certificates with the broad seal of New Jersey, entitled those holding them to vote, he would ask gentlemen, and the CHAIR particularly, what was to be done with the certificates and broad seal of the State of Pennsylvania, which certainly ought to be as broad as the great seal of New Jersey. In the case of the State of Pennsylvania, (said Mr. D.) we have the certificates of two Governors, both with the broad seal of the State, certifying that two different persons [Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. NAYLOR] are elected to represent the same district. What are you to do, said Mr. D. in that case? Will any gentleman tell me? If you admit the claimants from New Jersey, because they have the Governor's certificate with the broad seal, must you not admit both of the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania, each of whom have similar documents, and thus give Pennsylvania one Representative more than she is entitled to?

In order that the House might have time to reflect on the subject, and in order that the CHAIRMAN also might have time to reflect on it, he would move that, when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the motion by adjourning to meet on to-morrow at ten o'clock.

Before any question was put on this motion,

Mr. DUNCAN moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was carried without a division; and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, December 7, 1839.

Mr. SEVIER and Mr. PRENTISS appeared in their seats.

On motion, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, Dec. 7, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, the CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAMS) called the House to order, when the journal of yesterday was read; after which,

Mr. DROMGOOLE suggested an amendment to the journal, with regard to the declaration which he had made on yesterday. He had said that he would count all the members from New Jersey who presented themselves, unless otherwise directed by the House. The words by the House were omitted in the statement in the journal, and he moved that they be inserted.

Which motion was put to the House, and agreed to.

Mr. LINCOLN then suggested another amendment. He wished to have stated on the journal, immediately after the amendment which had just been made, the precise decision which the CHAIR had made, namely, that those gentlemen from New Jersey who held the certificate under the Constitution of the United States and laws of New Jersey, were the members entitled to vote.

The CHAIR remarked, that he had stated on yesterday, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] that those members were entitled to vote who held certificates according to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the laws of New Jersey, and that those persons who held certificates precisely similar to the member from New Jersey whose name had been called, and who had answered, were the persons who should be counted.

Mr. LINCOLN then moved that the decision be entered upon the journal in the words of the CHAIRMAN, now delivered.

Mr. DUNCAN had no objection to having the journal amended, if there was any error in it; but he objected to making a journal now, which would decide the very question of difficulty which we have been contending about for days. The matter proposed to be entered on the journal was the very matter which we had been contending about, and he objected to any such introduction upon the journal.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought that the gentleman from Ohio was mistaken with regard to the motion. The gentleman from Massachusetts only wished to have entered upon the journal the decision which the CHAIR had made, in the words in which it was made at the time.

Mr. DUNCAN said, if he was not mistaken, the CLERK had written out the decision of the CHAIR on yesterday, immediately on its being made; and presented it the CHAIRMAN, and asked if it was correct; and the CHAIR had agreed, at that time, that it was correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL appealed to the members present to say if the statement by the CHAIR, a few moments ago, was not a precise repetition of the decision of the CHAIR on yesterday? If so, he thought it but right that it should be placed on the journal in that way.

Mr. SMITH of Maine had distinctly understood the CHAIR, in reply to the question of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] to decide that "those gentlemen from New Jersey who had been returned to the House in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey," were entitled to vote upon the motion of the honorable member from South Carolina, to lay upon the table the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE;] and he should have felt bound to have voted to sustain that decision of the CHAIR, upon the appeal therefrom made by the gentleman from New York. He contended that the gentlemen who had been, by a majority of the people of New Jersey, elected to represent them in Congress, were alone legally elected, both by the laws of New Jersey and the Constitution of the United States, and could alone be legally returned to this House; and in accordance with the decision of the CHAIR, he presumed that the gentlemen they elected would vote. But when the decision of the CHAIR was read by the CLERK, as put by him upon the records of the House, "that those gentlemen only who have the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, under the broad seal of the State," were entitled to seats in the House, which decision, as thus recorded, he had observed the CLERK to submit to the revision of the CHAIR before it was read, and to which he had understood the CHAIR to assent, he had felt bound to vote against such decision—a decision setting aside and prostrating the most inestimable privilege of the free institutions of this country. He was satisfied that the record did not conform to the decision of the CHAIR as first promulgated, but was in strict conformity with that which had been subsequently read from the CLERK's desk, by authority of the CHAIR.

Mr. WISE had understood the decision of the CHAIR on yesterday to be as the CHAIR had repeated it this morning; and he presumed that the CHAIR had considered the statement made by the CLERK on the journal at that time, as an abbreviation of that decision; and knowing that that was not the time to correct the journal, and that when it was read this morning, would be the time to correct it, no exception was taken to the entry made by the CLERK. This was not the time to make a journal, to be sure, but this was the time correct it, and to place the facts upon it as they did occur. He therefore demanded that the journal might be so corrected as to state the facts.

Mr. CUSHING said he understood the decision of the CHAIR to be as repeated this morning, and the reporter of the Globe bore him out in this opinion. Mr. C. here read the decision as reported in the Globe.

Mr. ATHERTON understood the CHAIR to have decided, on yesterday, that the persons entitled to vote, were those who produced commissions according to the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of New Jersey; but he had no doubt that it was the intention of the CHAIR to identify the individuals who did produce those commissions, because, otherwise, he would have been deciding nothing. He understood the CHAIR, at that time, to refer to the commission of Mr. RANDOLPH, and to those who had produced similar commissions to his, as the persons who were entitled to vote.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said it seemed to him that every gentleman must agree that the decision of yesterday was precisely the statement of it made by the CHAIR this morning; and it seemed to him that the journal ought to state the precise words of that decision. It seemed to him that this was the very object of the journal, and it seemed to him that there ought to be no difficulty about the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said, there only seemed to be a difference of opinion with regard to the phraseology which should be spread on the record. We all agree, and the CHAIR confirms it to-day, that he did intend to decide, and actually does now decide, that Messrs. AYCRIGG, YORKE, &c. were entitled to vote; and gentlemen wish to spread on the record the reasoning of the CHAIR, which caused that decision. The CHAIR, and those who sustain him, wish to put on the record the reasoning which induced him to make the decision which he did. Now, he did not know whether it was customary for the SPEAKER of the House to spread on the record the reasons for his decisions. If so, he had no objection to the present amendment; and if this was not the practice of the SPEAKER of the House, he saw no reason for departing from the general course.

Mr. LINCOLN then submitted his amendment, in writing, in the following form:

"The Chairman decided that those persons were entitled to vote who had produced commissions from the Governor of New Jersey, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of New Jersey."

Mr. BRIGGS did not agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] that these were the reasons of the CHAIR for his decision. This was the decision of the CHAIR, in his opinion, and not his reasons.

Mr. BYNUM said he would state his recollection of the decision of the CHAIR. He heard the CHAIR distinctly announce that those persons were entitled to vote who held commissions under the Constitution and laws of New Jersey, but he had not heard a word mentioned from the CHAIR about the Constitution of the United States. He looked upon the whole of the decision as a usurpation of the rights of the members of the House and of the people of the country, and he was not now for permitting the correcting to be altered, for the purpose of suiting the ulterior designs of any set of individuals. He wanted the CLERK to state positively what did take place, and nothing else. We have arrived at a most novel and extraordinary stage of our proceedings, and he called upon the Democracy of the House, not to permit themselves to be gulled by the technicalities which gentlemen introduce here. He hoped that the facts, as they occurred, would be stated on the journal, but he had no idea of having the record encumbered by the additional amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to render a better excuse for the decision of the CHAIR.

The CHAIR stated that he had referred to the Constitution of the United States in his decision, before referring to the laws of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. MERCER also contended that the decision of the CHAIR of yesterday was precisely as it had been stated by the CHAIR to-day, and he held that this decision was not a usurpation of the rights of he House.

Mr. WHITE then called the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] to the decision of the CHAIR, as reported in one of the papers of this city, and inquired if he was not in error in regard to his recollection of it, and of the inquiry which he had propounded to the CHAIR.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he distinctly recollected that the CHAIR had said that those gentlemen were entitled to vote, who held commissions in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws of New Jersey. If, however, the gentleman from Kentucky would read a few paragraphs farther in that report, he would find that the CHAIR had declared that those who hold commissions similar to that held by Mr. RANDOLPH, were the persons who were entitled to vote.

The CHAIR said he had stated that those five persons who held certificates similar to the member from New Jersey, who had been called and answered to his name, were the persons who would, in the opinion of the CHAIR be entitled to vote.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Certainly that was the decision of the CHAIR.

The CHAIR then propounded the question to the House upon the amendment of the journal, when, tellers were called for, and the CHAIR appointed Mr. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, and Mr. CRABB, of Alabama, to act as tellers—both opposed to the Administration.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested to the CHAIR, that the usual course was to appoint a teller from each of the two parties.

The CHAIR then named Mr. BYNUM and Mr. GIDDINGS to act as tellers.

Mr. BYNUM said he should like to know whether he was to count those persons whose seats were contested on this floor or not.

Mr. RICE GARLAND objected to that question being put.

The CHAIR said that that question had been decided on yesterday.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I will not act as a teller of this meeting.

The CHAIR said the gentlemen who acted as tellers would please count all who passed between them; and if any member passed through whose title to a seat they considered contested, they should report that fact to the meeting, and the meeting would decide on the question.

Mr. BYNUM wished to understand his duty as a teller, if he was to act as such. He did not think that the members whose rights were contested in the House should vote under any circumstances, and he did not think that the CHAIR had the power to decide that they had the right to vote. Mr. B. then refused to act as a teller.

The CHAIR then named Mr. SMITH, of Maine, to act as a teller.

Mr. SMITH stated that he was unacquainted, personally, with the members of the House, and did not know the members from New Jersey on either side, so that it would be impossible for him to report to the House whether any persons had voted whose rights were contested.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will stand by the side of the gentleman, and tell him the names of the members from New Jersey on both sides as they pass him.

The House then divided upon the amendment of the journal, and the tellers reported 106 in favor of the amendment, and 107 against it, neither of the New Jersey members voting upon the question. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SLADE then moved to strike from the decision of the CHAIR of yesterday, as entered upon the journal, the words, "the CHAIR made this decision with the greater confidence, because he had declared it before he had been placed by a vote of the House in the place he now occupied.

Mr. PETRIKIN wished to know if it was in order now to amend the paragraph which they had just decided the would not amend.

Mr. SLADE then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GRAVES then moved to amend the journal, by striking out from the declaration made by Mr. DROMGOOLE yesterday, the words "unless otherwise directed by the House." Mr. G. felt perfectly convinced that that language had not been used by the gentleman from Virginia at the time he put the interrogatory to the CHAIR, therefore he desired that it might be struck from the journal.

Mr. WISE hoped his friend from Kentucky would not press this amendment, for he recollected distinctly that his colleague had used the words "unless instructed otherwise by the House."

Mr. GRAVES contended that if those words had been used by the gentleman from Virginia, they were used after the CHAIR had made his decision, and not at the time that he propounded the inquiry to the CHAIR, and consequently they ought to be struck from the journal at the place where they were inserted. He was the more convinced that the gentleman had not used these words at the time referred to because he had the testimony of the fact from the reports of every reporter and letter writer in the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE hoped it was not the intention of the gentleman from Kentucky to impute to him the charge of having made a wilful misstatement on the floor. He was strangely mistaken in his recollection, if he did not use the words, "unless otherwise directed by the House." He did not know what the reporters had said in relation to this matter; and as to what the letter writers had said, he was also uninformed, for he read but few of their letters. But he thought he had stated on yesterday that he did not rise to debate the question, but being called to discharge a duty as a teller, and being unwilling to decline discharging that duty, he had made an inquiry as to the manner in which that duty was to be discharged. He had then stated that there were present ten gentlemen from New Jersey, who had placed their names on desks on this floor, and who claimed seats as members, and he had asked how he could decide as to which of these persons were entitled to vote. He had then stated to the CHAIR, that if he was called upon to discharge this duty, he would count the whole ten members, unless otherwise directed by the House. The CHAIR, as he understood him, had made a general decision, as to who should be counted, when he replied that he did not know the members from New Jersey, but he was quite certain that before the CHAIR made his final decision, he (Mr. D.) stated that he would count all the members from New Jersey, unless otherwise directed by the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAMS) said he certainly understood the gentleman from Virginia to say that he would count all the persons claiming seats from New Jersey unless otherwise directed by the House; and it was because the gentleman had said that he would count persons whom the CHAIR supposed could not constitutionally vote, that the CHAIR had made the decision which had been referred to. There were, as it appeared, eleven members on the floor claiming seats as the Representatives of the State of New Jersey, when that State was entitled to but six members; and when one of the tellers declared that unless otherwise directed, he would count the whole of these eleven persons, the CHAIR found himself compelled to say that he could only count those legally and constitutionally entitled to seats. This was the reason why the CHAIR made the decision as as he had made it. Otherwise he would have decided as he had done done to-day. If it had not been for that declaration of the teller, the CHAIR would have said to the tellers, that whenever a person attempted to vote whom they considered as not entitled to vote, they should report that fact to the meeting, and the meeting would decide on the question. It was this declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, that he would count all who presented themselves, which induced the CHAIR to decide that those persons only were entitled to vote who had presented the evidence required by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey; and in making this decision, the CHAIR had no disposition to usurp the powers of the House; because he was perfectly aware that what did take place would take place—that an appeal would be taken from the decision of the CHAIR to the meeting itself, and that the meeting would have to decide it. His decision was merely provisional, and it was for the meeting to correct that decision, if they conceived it to be in error. The CHAIR conceived this to be no usurpation of the powers of the body; and in regard to the observations which had been made on the floor, charging him with having committed a monstrous usurpation, he would only say, in reply to the gentleman who made these observations, if they were made for the purpose of intimidating the CHAIR from performing his duties as he understood them, they were mistaken in regard to the effect which they would have. The CHAIR would, however, here observe that, in his belief, there was in this meeting at the present time, more of heat than of diversity of opinion upon the subject. The CHAIR made this decision, aware not only that it was subject to appeal to the majority of the meeting itself, but he decided nothing as to the power of the members from New Jersey to vote on the main question which was in issue—that is to say, upon the election of Speaker of this House. The CHAIR considered himself in the place he now occupied for the sole purpose of organizing the House, and the moment it was organized, the CHAIRMAN would call upon them, according to the requisitions of the Constitution to elect a Speaker, and under the rules of the House, that election was to be viva voce. When that took place, all the powers of the present CHAIRMAN closed. But upon that election of Speaker, if any individual presented himself, whom any other member of the House believed not authorized to vote, objection could be taken to the counting of his vote, and then the House would finally decide on that question. As to all these questions which had been agitated upon the motions to amend the journal, the CHAIR would only say, as he had said before, that there was more heat in them than diversity of opinion; and the CHAIR, above all things, was desirous to allay that heat, and bring the meeting to a cool and calm decision on the question before them; and as to the ultimate result—the question whether the New Jersey members should vote upon the election of a Speaker, or not—he thought it time to settle that question when it should arise. At the present moment, when the question was made as to who should be counted, the CHAIR was not compelled to forbid the tellers from doing that which they said they would do—that is to say, count persons not entitled to vote; and in order to prevent that, the CHAIR proposed that the tellers should report whoever passed between them, and if any person passed through, whose right to vote was contested, to report that fact to the meeting. Well, what was the fact? No objection was made on either side, to any person who passed through; and who can tell that the case will not be precisely the same in the election of a Speaker. Who can tell whether this question will arise at all. If it does arise, then the House, being organized, will be prepared to decide it in the regular form. The CHAIRMAN considers that his duties will be at an end the moment the House is organized; for he will then call upon the House to elect a Speaker, and whenever objections is made to any member voting on that election, it will be for the House to decide that question. The CHAIRMAN can decide nothing in regard to that, as he was appointed to the CHAIR for no other purpose than to complete the call of the roll of the House, and have put down upon it the name of every person claiming to be a member. The CHAIR has decided no question whatever which will effect the practical point of controversy, and when the House arrived at that, it can decide it freely and fully. Where, then, was the usurpation spoken of in the decisions of the CHAIR? The CHAIR has said that his sole and greatest object here was, if possible, to allay the heat exhibited, and bring every member to decide coolly on the question before him. There was an expedient whic hhad occurred to the CHAIR of avoiding all these questions of difficulty, and that was a case which occurred in the last Presidential election. In that case, it will be within the recollection of most of the members of this House, there was a qnestion whether the vote of the State of Michigan should be admitted and counted. It will be recollected that, at that time, the State had not been admitted into the Union, but had formed itself into a State Government, and appointed electors to vote for President and Vice President. When the votes of the different States were sent in, Michigan among the rest, a question arose, the same in principle with the present question, as to whether the vote of the State of Michigan should be counted, and the course taken at that time was this: A resolution was presented to the Senate and passed, as follows:

Resolved, That in relation to the votes of Michigan, if the counting or omitting to count them shall not essentially change the result of the election, they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: "Were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be for A. B. for President of the United States ——— votes. If not counted, for A. B. for President of the United States ——— votes. But in either case A. B. is elected President of the United States" And in the same manner for Vice President.

This resolution was coincided in by the House of Representatives, and accordingly when the votes were counted up on this floor, the votes of Michigan were included, and it was announced—for Martin Van Buren, if the votes of Michigan be counted, 170; if the votes of Michigan be not counted, 167; but in either event, Martin Van Buren of New York is elected President of the United States.

It seemed to him that this precedent furnished a principle by which this whole difficulty might be settled. Let the members from New Jersey be counted as voting, as he held that to be the due of the people of New Jersey, for he begged the meeting to understand, in the course he had taken, that it was the right of the people of New Jersey which he attempted to sustain. If those persons were prevented from voting who come here commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey, the people of New Jersey were deprived of their representation in Congress, and it was his wish, above all things, if possible, to avoid the suppression of the voice of the people of New Jersey. As to the question whether the State of New Jersey should be represented by one set of men or another set of men, he believed there was not much diversity of opinion in the House. At least, for himself, he would appeal to the resolution which he had offered at the last session. He would appeal to that resolution as an evidence that then, as now, his opinion was that a Speaker could not be elected until this question was first decided. That was his opinion then; it was his opinion now; and he had offered this resolution to avoid the very difficulty in which we were now involved. He was of opinion then, as now, that the election of Speaker could not take place, considering the state of parties in this House, until the question with regard to the New Jersey members was first settled, and he had offered that resolution to provide for the case. The House chose not to consider that resolution, and the case was unprovided for, and it is now for the House to decide. The House, when it is properly constituted, will be competent to decide it, and it may, before the election of a Speaker, appoint a committee to examine this question between the different returns from New Jersey, and report that to the House, and the House may decide upon it. With respect to the difficulty of persons attempting to vote whose rights are disputed, it appeared by the question just settled, that no such case had arisen, and it was premature to look forward to such a case. When the question came practically up as to whether those members should be counted or not, it appeared to him that the case of the vote of the State of Michigan, in the last Presidential election, would provide a solution of that difficulty. And with respect to the right of voting of these members, there was a precedent under the old form of Government, which might serve to throw some light on the subject. If gentlemen would consult the journals of the old Congress, fourth volume, page 406, they would find that a gentleman claiming a seat from the State of Rhode Island, by the name of Howell, rose to speak upon a motion, when he was called to order by Mr. Mercer, and a question was made whether he had a right to speak or participate in the proceedings of Congress, because the State of Rhode Island only elected members for one year, and that year had expired. This question was put to the House in ten or fifteen different forms, as to whether the members froms Rhode Island should be permitted to vote, and on every one of those questions, the members from Rhode Island did vote until the question was finally given up. Now with these two precedents in view, he would ask gentlemen to examine the matter before us, and see if they could not come to the solution of the question perfectly satisfactory on all sides.

Mr. GRAVES made some further remarks in support of his motion.

Mr. WISE said he would state the facts again, and as he was very confident in the truth of his recollections, he would ask it of his friend from Kentucky as a personal favor that he would withdraw his motion. He would state again that his colleague did make the declaration he asserted he did; and he was confirmed in his recollections from the fact when the CHAIR reported to the House what had been said by his colleague, the latter rose, and corrected him by stating that he said that he would count all who presented themselves, unless otherwise directed by the House. In the correctness of this statement, Mr. W. said he was sustained by the recollections of all the gentlemen round him, both of the Opposition and Administration parties.

Mr. GRAVES said it appeared to him that there was only a misunderstanding between himself and the gentleman from Virginia. The gentleman's colleague did, it was true, add the words stated, but it was after the decision of the CHAIR was given. If the appeal was made on the ground that the gentleman from Virginia would, unless otherwise directed by the House, &c. and it should so appear on the journal, he would vote against sustaing the decision of the CHAIR. But if it was, as his honorable friend friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had said, that his colleague [Mr. DROMGOOLE] did not ask the opinion of the CHAIR, how could he [Mr. WISE] have risen in his seat, and repelled with such warmth and indignation the charge made by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL] that the CHAIRMAN had been guilty of an act of usurpation. Sir, it would have been usurpation—gross usurpation—and the gentleman from New York was correct in characterizing it as such. Mr. G. after some further remarks, withdrew his motion.

Mr. RHETT rose, and asked the consent of the House to make another correction of the journal. It was as to the power of the CHAIR in the place he occupied. This correction had now become important, to know what were the powers of the CHAIR.

Mr. R. here read his motion as follows, and hoped he would get the unanimous consent of the House to its adoption:

"Mr. RHETT moved a resolution that Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS, being the oldest member of the House of Representatives, be appointed a Chairman of this House, to serve until the election of a Speaker.

"Mr. WILLIAMS objecting to serve,

"Mr. RHETT moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS be appointed Chairman of this House until the the House be organized by the election of a Speaker.

"Mr. RHETT then put the question to the members on the adoption of the resolution, and the same being carried, Mr. ADAMS was conducted to the Chair."

The motion being read, the question was put, and it was carried without a division.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, from Tennessee, rose and said, that if the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] who was entitled to the floor, would allow him to do so, he wished to submit a suggestion to the House, that might, and he hoped would, terminate the difficulties by which the House had been embarrassed the past week—that he did not propose to submit a proposition to take the place of the resolution now under consideration, and thereby deprive his friend from Ohio of the privilege of addressing the House upon that question, but to make a bare suggestion, that would meet the approbation of both sides of the House.

Mr. DUNCAN having yielded the floor,

Mr. JOHNSON proceeded to say that he had witnessed, with great regret, the course of proceedings since Monday last—that we had become so much involved in technicalities, and so much embarrassed by the rules and questions of order that had been made, that he did not see any probable end to the difficulty, unless by some kind of compromise—that he was himself sincerely desirous of settling fairly and justly the rights of the several claimants to seats on this floor; and he was sure that the other members present had similar feelings and wishes. The American people expected this at our hands, and he did not know that either party had acquired any credit in the conflict which had been kept up since Monday morning. He said, whilst the CHAIRMAN was addressing the House, and making some suggestions as to the mode in which it might be done, and the manner in which the House disposed of the vote of Michigan, which was contested in the last Presidential election, it occurred to him there could be no difficulty, upon some similar principles, of adjusting the present controversy to the satisfaction of the House and the country. He therefore arose to suggest that if the House would appoint a committee of the prudent, discreet, cautious men, some six or ten men, an equal number from each side of the House, and adjourn over until Monday, he felt confident that in the mean time the subject might be fully examined, and some means suggested by which all our difficulties might be avoided. Let each party in the House select from among themselves three or five men having the confidence of their political friends, distinguished, as he hoped they would be, for their wisdom and moderation, and he had no question that some mode of action would be agreed on, by which the objects we all aim at may be accomplished, and justice done to the parties claiming seats here, and to the people. Unless something of this sort should be agreed to on all sides, he did not see when this House would be organized, and ready to transact the business for which they were sent here by the people. Mr. J. said he was not authorized to submit such a proposition to the House, unless by the general consent of the House.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. PETRIKIN called the gentleman from Indiana to order.

The CHAIR stated that, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was entitled to the floor, the call for the previous question was not in order.

Mr. PROFFIT said, then I bow to the decision of the CHAIR. But I ask if I may be allowed to answer the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee. (Cries of order.) He had no idea that a gentleman, who was one of the principal causes of the difficulty in which the House was involved, and whose course, with that of his friends, had kept them the whole week consuming time in debate, instead of organizing for the despatch of the public business, should he be permitted to come forward with propositions to compromise—

[Several voices were heard calling the gentleman from Indiana to order.]

Mr. DUNCAN. We have not kept the House from organizing, nor have we occasioned the debates that have occupied the time of the House for the past week. All the difficulty in which the House was involved, and all the debate that had ensued, had been caused by those who wished to force on the House as members, persons who, it was notorious, had not been elected by the people.

Mr. PROFFIT [taking his seat] said: I shall yet have an opportunity of taking hold of the gentleman and a few others.

Mr. CHINN said that he was perfectly aware that he was out of order in now rising, and therefore asked the indulgence of the House while he made a proposition that he thought would meet the views of a majority of the gentlemen present. Mr. C. then read the following:

Resolved, That the CLERK be instructed to proceed in the call of the members of this House, not omitting the five members from New Jersey who hold the Governor's certificate, and proceed thus until all the members are called, after which the House thus called shall proceed to the election of a Speaker, and if it should appear that any member has voted whose seat is contested, that then the House, still acting under the government of its CHAIRMAN, shall proceed to determine the question as to who shall have the right to the seats thus contested. It being expressly understood that such decision shall not be final, but only determine who are entitled to take their seats to assist in the organization of the House.

Mr. CHINN, on being called to order by several gentlemen, resumed his seat.

Mr. DICKERSON from New Jersey rose, and appealed to his friend from Ohio to yield the floor to him to enable him to make an explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland insisted on the rules of the House being preserved; and that if the gentleman from Ohio yielded his place again, he should not be permitted himself to decide who was to speak. These propositions, which were sprung on them on a sudden, gave rise to debate that might be endless.

Mr. DUNCAN observed that he held himself under no obligations to yield the floor to any gentleman, and certainly he was under no disposition to do it for the purpose that the gentleman from Maryland supposed—that propositions might be sprung upon them of a sudden. But, sir, (said Mr. D.) it has always been the custom in the House for gentlemen to yield the floor when it was asked for the purpose of making an explanation. He had never known that when a member yielded the floor for such a purpose that it occasioned the loss of it. He was always at liberty to go on; he lost nothing by this customary act of courtesy and good feeling, for it never had been the rule of the House to deprive him of the privilege of going on with his speech. Now, he was not in a hurry about making a speech; he had no desire of hearing himself talk, and he would agree never to address the House again on that subject if a proposition for a compromise could be accepted. He would agree never to speak again on this subject, rather than that any gentleman who wished to make an important explanation, necessary to elucidate the subject, should be prevented from so doing. He therefore felt bound to yield the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland rose to a point of order. The gentleman, he said, had not a right to yield the floor for the purpose of adjudging it to any other gentleman. If he gave it up, the CHAIR must designate who was to occupy it.

Mr. DICKERSON attempted to address the CHAIR, but was prevented from being heard by loud cries of order! order! from gentlemen of the Opposition party. Much confusion prevailed, and the noise was kept up so as to prevent Mr. D from proceeding.

Mr. GRAVES protested against the right of the gentleman from Ohio to yield the floor, and at the same designate the person who was to occupy it.

Several voices were heard, saying "the gentleman from Ohio is on the floor;" and cries of order continued.

Mr. WISE hoped the CHAIR would bring the gentleman to order. I hope, said he, the CHAIR will make us all take our seats, and not let us all talk at a time.

Mr. VANDERPOEL made a few observations, which were not heard, from the noise and confusion prevailing at the time.

Mr. CRAIG submitted to the CHAIR whether, when the gentleman from Ohio yielded the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey, he was not entitled to it; and he submitted to the gentlemen present, whether they would not, at least as a matter of courtesy, suffer the gentleman from New Jersey to go on.

Mr. JOHNSON of Md. again denied the power of the gentleman from Ohio to yield the floor to any person he pleased. When the gentleman yields the floor, he repeated, it is for the CHAIR alone to decide who is to occupy it.

Mr. DICKERSON again attempted to address the CHAIR, but was again interrupted by loud cries of "Order! order!" from the gentlemen of the Opposition, and prevented from proceeding.

Mr. JENIFER then rose and moved "that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DICKERSON] have permission to address the House, not as a question of right, but of courtesy."

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would like to know the ground on which objection was made to the gentleman's addressing the House?

Mr. GRANGER said he would answer his colleague. He objected to the gentleman's speaking, because he came here to contest the seats of gentlemen who had the certificates of the Governor of the State of New Jersey that they were duly elected the Representatives from that State.

Mr. GRAVES made some remarks, which were not heard.

Mr. JENIFER renewed his motion.

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to the motion. He could not permit it to be said that the gentleman from New Jersey addressed the House as a matter of courtesy. The gentleman asked no favors, but demanded it as a right; and in fact he had as much right to address the House as any gentleman present.

Mr. DUNCAN also repelled the idea of the gentleman's addressing the House as a matter of courtesy. The gentleman, he said, must address the House as a matter of right, and not of courtesy, or not at all.

Mr. WISE observed that this, then, was the best form in which they could try the question involved. If, said he, Mr. DICKERSON attempts to address the House, I call for his credentials. As to Mr. DICKERSON, I will extend to him as a friend every courtesy; but I only know him here through the law. I ask him, therefore, to produce his credentials; and this will be as good a mode of deciding this question as any other.

Mr. JOHNSON rose to a question of order. The gentleman from Ohio, he said, must either take his seat, or progress in his remarks. He insisted that the CHAIR should order the gentleman either to take his seat or go on.

Mr. DUNCAN still continuing on the floor,

Mr. PROFFIT rose and said a few words that were not heard.

Several gentlemen called Mr. PROFFIT to order; when

The CHAIR asked if the gentleman from Ohio yielded the floor.

Mr. DUNCAN replied in the negative; and several gentlemen requesting Mr. D. to proceed in his remarks, he commenced with a few remarks which were not heard. He knew, he said, the principles he was acting on, and knew that they were in accordance with those entertained by the people of the United States. He knew he was maintaining the principles here which depended for their preservation on the purity of the elective franchise, and he cared not whether this was assaulted by management or stratagem; he was equally bound to defend it. This question must, he said, be discussed, and it mattered not whether it was discussed now or hereafter; its merits must be gone into, and all the efforts of the Opposition to prevent it would be fruitless and unavailing. What was the history of this matter? It was well known to every gentleman here, and the knowledge of the fact was so general that it was almost useless to repeat it; but, as other gentlemen had done it, he would do it from the same motive; and that was, for home consumption.

Mr. D. then went on to detail the proceedings of the CLERK in calling the House to order, and calling over the roll until he was arrested by coming to the members from New Jersey, which he said was in conformity with usage, with law, and with the obligations imposed on him by the sanctity of an oath. He himself, Mr. D. said, had interrupted the CLERK when, in calling the roll, he came to the State of New Jersey, but perhaps in too low a voice to be heard; and he had determined beforehand not to let the gentlemen who came here without having a majority of the popular vote, be called. Whether the CLERK was solely interrupted by his objections, or from any other cause, he did not know; but this he did know, that the CLERK did not pursue the course because required of him by the Democratic party. Did the CLERK do right, or did he do wrong? If he was right, then all the censures for waste of the public time and the public money, must rest upon those who opposed his proceeding with the call of the roll, because he submitted the decision in the case of the New Jersey members to the House itself. If he was wrong, then let all these censures rest on those who have supported him in the course he has taken. Mr. D said the CLERK was right. He was bound by the very nature of his duty, and by the oath he had taken, to act as he had done. What was his duty? He was bound by his duty to enrol the names of the members of the Twenty-sixth Congress. He had evidence, conclusive to his mind, that JOHN B. AYCRIGG, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL, WILLIAM HALSTED, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS J. YORKE, were not elected members of the Twenty-sixth Congress. He had evidence of that fact in his possession, and what would be his situation, Mr. D. asked, had he enrolled their names, and called them as members of this Congress? Sir, (said Mr. D.) he would be looked upon by the moral intelligence of the country, as having violated the obligations of duty, and the sanctity of an oath. He had evidence that they were not members of the Twenty-sixth Congress, and he submitted the question involved to the House, suggesting a postponement of the case of the New Jersey members until the rest of the roll should be called over and a quorum ascertained. It had been contended strenuously that these five gentlemen possessed, as evidence of their election, the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, with the "broad seal" of the State, and that this was the only evidence he was entitled to receive. The whole argument, from that time to this, puts him in mind of a little book he had read on logic, and from which he would cite a few examples: "Gentlemen wear boots; A B wears boots; therefore A B is a gentleman." "Ladies wear corsets; Miss A wears corsets; therefore Miss A is a lady." The fact, according to this logic, that A B wears boots, is prima facie evidence that he is a gentleman; and the fact that Miss A wears corsets, is prima facie evidence that she is a lady. And yet, said Mr. D. I have known many men to wear boots who are not gentlemen, and many women and girls to wear corsets who are not ladies. (Much laughter.) The wearing of boots and corsets is so general, that it no longer furnishes evidence of the wearers being gentlemen and ladies. So also with members of Congress. The certificate and "broad seal" is so common to members of Congress, that it is no longer prima facie evidence of membership. He knew pretended members of Congress who bear the certificates and broad seals, who are not members; and it was getting so common, that the fact of their having such was not prima facie evidence of their membership. We have heard much (said Mr. D.) about this "broad seal," and he did not know that it was worth while to say much about it; he had heard it mentioned at least one thousand times in the course of this debate. It seemed that it was a very broad seal indeed. One gentleman held that it was not the track of a calf's foot, but of an ox's foot. As he remarked last evening, it must be as broad as the foot of Milton's devil when he was cast out of Paradise, which covered ten acres. At least it was broad enough to cover two townships in New Jersey and neutralize the Democratic votes of a whole State. Now he wanted to know what there was in reality about this seal to give it so much importance. He supposed it derived its solemnity and consideration from its antiquity. If so, it must be remembered that it had its origin in the days of ignorance, when men could neither read nor write. In England, it had been the fate of the broad seal, to which gentlemen attached so much importance, to be cast into the Thames, where it now lies. King James II threw it into the river, thinking that by the loss of the "great seal," he could get rid of some obligations imposed on him. According to the doctrines of gentlemen, therefore, if they want to hunt for the great seal of England, they must go to the bottom of the Thames for it.

Now he had stated that the CLERK had the most conclusive evidence in his possession, that the names he had read were not members of the Twenty-sixth Congress, and therefore, he was solemnly bound by his duty, not to enrol them as members of the Twenty-sixth Congress. He asked, therefore, the reading of that evidence.

The CLERK then read the following documents, which had been filed in his office:

The following is the certificate of the Secretary of State of New Jersey, showing the returns of election on record in his office:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, ss.

I, James D. Westcott, Secretary of State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that, upon a careful examination of all the returns made by the several clerks of the respective counties in said State, and filed in my office, and also of returns of votes given in the townships of South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, and of Millville, in the county of Cumberland, verified by the affidavits of the several township officers of election in said townships respectively, which township returns were not included in the returns of the clerks of said counties of Middlesex and Cumberland, and which were directed to be filed by the Governor, and now remain on file in my office, of the election for members to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, held on the 9th and 10th days of October, 1838, it appears that Philemon Dickerson had	-	28,453 votes.

Manning Force -	-	28,314 "
Peter D. Vroom	-	28,492 "
Daniel B. Ryall	-	28,441 "
William R Cooper	-	28,455 "
Joseph Kille -	-	28,426 "
John B. Aycrigg	-	28,294 "
John P. B. Maxwell	-	28,393 "
Wm. Halsted -	-	28,337 "
Joseph F. Randolph	-	28,427 "
Thomas Jones Yorke	-	28,321 "
Charles C. Stratton	-	28,396 "

And by which it appears that, at said election, Philemon Dickerson, Peter D. Vroom, Daniel B. Ryall, William R. Cooper, Joseph Kille, and Joseph F. Randolph, received a majority of the whole number of votes given in the State of New Jersey for Representatives of said State in the House of Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office, at the city of Trenton, in said State, this 25th day of October, in the year of our Lord, 1839, and of the Independence of the United States the sixty-fourth.

L. S.

JAMES D. WESTCOTT.

[Various other statements, and much testimony legally taken, was read from the CLERK'S table, going to show, beyond controversy, that the members who hold the certificates of the Governor were not elected, but that the Democratic claimants received a legal majority of the votes of the people of New Jersey.]

The following are copies of the results of the polls of the districts of Millville and South Amboy, legally certified to by the judges and inspectors of election; and also certified by the clerks of Cumberland and Middlesex counties as being on record in their respective offices, and which, by the usurpation of power and violation of law by said clerks, were suppressed or withheld, and which the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey failed to count in the result upon which they granted certificates to the Federal members:

We, the judges and inspectors of the election of the township of South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, do hereby certify that having proceeded to receive the votes of the voters of the said township, the following is a true list of all the candidates voted for, of the offices proposed for them, and of the number of votes for each:

*The words, "whole number of votes three hundred and six," were interlined before signing.

We, the subscribers, residents and freeholders in the township of Millville, do hereby certify that William Charlesworth was duly and legally elected one of the Inspectors of an election for members of Congress, members of Council, Assembly, Sheriff, and Coroners, held in the township of Millville, in the county of Cumberland, on the ninth and tenth day of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, in the room and place of Nathaniel Foster, who, being a candidate, could not serve.

WM. STRATTON, [L. s]
JAMES M. BROOKFIELD, [L. s]
JOHN OTTERSON, [L s.]

State of New Jersey, Cumberland county, ss.

I, Josiah Fithian, Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in and for said county, do certify that the foregoing are true copies of the original certificates received by me at my house, by the hands of William Stratton, on Saturday, the thirteenth day of October, A. D. 1838, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock in the afternoon of said day.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed my seal of office, this eighteenth day of October, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight.

JOSIAH FITHIAN, Clk.

While the CLERK was progressing with this testimony, he was interrupted by

Mr. HALSTED, who rose to a question of order, and inquired whether it was competent for the gentleman from Ohio to have read as part of his speech, evidence which was taken contrary to the laws* of New Jersey. We have, said he, abundance of testimony taken in accordance with the law, which they also could produce.

Mr. DUNCAN. The gentleman can have his testimony read, if he pleases, at a proper time.

The CHAIR said that when the reading of papers was called for, and not objected to at the time, the reading must be suffered to go on.

Mr. WHITE rose to a question of order. He asked if these depositions were taken under legal notice, and in conformity with the laws of the State of New Jersey.

The CHAIR said that the documents were read as a part of the gentleman's speech.

Mr. WHITE said he objected to the reading of depositions taken without notice and in due form of law. He protested against the reading of such depositions when the rights of gentlemen were thereby infringed.

Mr. CRAIG observed that these depositions were not to bind any one, and gentlemen could form such opinions with regard to them as they thought proper. He understood, however, that the documents now being read formed part of the evidence that was before the Executive Council of New Jersey, and the legality was not then contested. He submitted to gentlemen whether it could be considered fair to suppress any of the testimony necessary for a correct understanding of the question.

Mr. WHITE renewed his appeal to the CHAIR on the point of order, and was proceeding to discuss it; when

Mr. TURNEY called him to order.

The CHAIR said, that when an objection was made to the reading of a document, the rule required that the question as to reading it must be determined by a vote of the House.

Mr. DUNCAN observed that the reason why he wanted the reading of the documents was, that he had stated that the five gentlemen whose names he mentioned had not the evidence of membership required by the laws of New Jersey. This he had repeatedly stated, both in public and in private, and he therefore desired the reading of these documents to support the truth of what he said. He had a right to have them read for his own security, for they would prove conclusively to every unprejudiced mind that the certificates and "broad seal" produced by these gentlemen were not in conformity with the laws of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiania inquired if the papers were private papers belonging to the gentleman from Ohio, or papers in the possession of the House.

The CHAIR said that they were papers lying on the CLERK's table.

Mr. GARLAND. Then it seemed that they were papers belonging to the CLERK's office, and if the gentleman from Ohio had a right to have them read, any gentleman here might call for the reading of all the documents in the CLERK's office. Now, what I understand from the rule is this: that papers may be read if they are private property, and not if they are public records.

Mr. TILLINGHAST gave it as his opinion that the papers could not be read without the assent of the House, and referred gentlemen to Jefferson's Manual in support of his opinion.

Mr. VANDERPOEL was informed that these papers were returned to the Governor of New Jersey, and laid before the Privy Council, and were part of the evidence on which they acted: papers which Mr. DICKERSON, and those who claim with him, had no agency in procuring. I should be glad, said Mr. V. to have these papers before the House in some form. I say give us light.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I must correct the gentleman. These papers never were before the Privy Council.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. I am authorized to say by Mr. DICKERSON and Mr. VROOM that they were.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentlemen are mistaken: they were not before the Privy Council.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. These papers are copies, but does the gentleman mean to deny that the original papers, of which these are copies, were before the Governor and Council of New Jersey?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, sir.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. Then I will submit it to the House, whether the denial of the honorable gentleman was not a quibble.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not deny that they were laid before the Council, and placed on file, but the question of their reception was argued, and ably argued, and one of the points decided was, that they should not be received.

Mr. WHITE referred to the Manual, to show that no member could read papers without the leave of the House.

Mr. BYNUM. I hope that if this House means to preserve even the appearance of justice, that these documents may be permitted to be read I hope, for the credit of the House, that this investigation may be conducted in a fair and impartial manner, and that no testimony may be suppressed which is necessary to a correct understanding of the question. Why, we have had gentlemen acting almost like attorneys here—feed attorneys, for aught I know—occupying almost the whole time of the House, with arguments and testimony on one side, while not one word of testimony has been permitted to be given on the other. Weak must be the argument, weak must be the cause, which requires such a support.

Mr WHITE. If the gentleman will state that this testimony was taken in conformity with the laws of New Jersey, I will withdraw my objections to it.

Mr. BYNUM. I have nothing to do with the laws of New Jersey. I am for the people of New Jersey, and their right to say who shall be their Representatives here. Statement after statement, and certificate after certificate, has been read on one side, while not one particle of evidence has been suffered to come out on the part of the other. Now if gentlemen can succeed in preventing the people of New Jersey from being heard on this floor, we understand the game they are playing; but we want also to understand the game that the people of New Jersey are playing, and we want also to hear what evidence they adduce to justify the Representatives they have chosen in taking their seats here. If gentlemen have that candor and that fairness which all ought to possess, they would say at once to us: Bring forward your evidence, let it be read, and we will then bring forward evidence to counteract it. Mr. B. protested against the never ending quibbling manner in which gentlemen sought to suppress the evidence which operated against them. He hoped, if this kind of objections were persisted in, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] would read that statement from the CHAIR. This he had a right to do, if gentlemen, in courtesy to him, would not permit it to be done by the CLERK. Gentlemen of the Opposition would therefore gain but little by preventing the CLERK from reading the testimony. It was the truth, they were attempting to stifle, which, sooner or later, must come before the world, when their object in endeavoring to suppress it, would be clearly understood.

Mr. DUNCAN, at the solicitation of Mr. CRAIG, gave way for a motion of adjournment.

And the House adjourned.

*We learn, from the very best authority, that the law alluded to by Mr. HALSTED has been enacted subsequently to the taking of these depositions, and was passed for the purpose of attempting to invalidate them.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, December 9, 1839.

Mr. STRANGE appeared in his seat this morning.

Mr. ALLEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication of an Executive character which he may make.

No objection being made, the resolution was considered and agreed to, and Messrs. ALLEN and WRIGHT were appointed the committee.

Mr. TAPPAN offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate:

1. What would be the effect upon the military service of the country, of a regulation by which all officers of the army, on arriving at sixty years of age, should be permitted to retire from service upon half pay.

2. What would be the probable annual charge upon the Treasury of such a regulation.

This being the day designated for the election of the officers of the Senate, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a Secretary, and on counting the ballots the following was declared to be the result:

Whole number of ballots - -	37
For Asbury Dickens - -	37

Mr. DICKENS, accordingly, was declared to be unanimously re-elected.

The oath of office was then administered to Mr. Dickens by the CHAIR.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for a Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, and the following was declared to be the result:

Whole number of ballots - -	37
For Stephen Haight - -	36
Mr. Bassett - - -	1

Mr. HAIGHT was accordingly declared to be re elected, and took the oath of office.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for an Assistant Doorkeeper, and the following was declared to be the result:

	First ballot.	Second ballot.	Third ballot.
For Mr. Beal,	15	17	20
Bassett,	6	8	6
Dyer,	2	6	7
Robinson,	3	2	3
Hanna,	2	2	1
Hanson,	1
Randolph,	4	1
Owner,	1
Hawe,	1
Spencer,	1

Mr. BEAL having, on the third ballot, received a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared to be elected, and took the oath of office.

Mr. HUBBARD gave notice that he would, at the earliest day it would be in order to do so, ask leave to bring in a bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and determine claims against the United States.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, December 9, 1839.

At 12 o'clock the CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAMS) called the House to order, when the journal of Saturday was read.

The question was then stated by the CHAIR to be on the objections of Mr. WHITE of Kentucky to the reading of certain documents by the CLERK, the reading of which had been called for by Mr. DUNCAN, in the course of his speech.

Mr. GRANGER addressed the House at some length upon this point. He took it for granted, from the course of the majority in the House, and the language of the official organ of the Administration, that the majority—the one hundred and twenty-one members—were determined to settle this question with regard to the New Jersey members, before the House proceeded to organize, by the election of a Speaker, and other officers. If this was the course intended to be pursued, and if it was determined in the House that the testimony on the part of one set of persons from New Jersey should be presented to the House, he thought it important that an opportunity should be given the members on the other side to present testimony also to the House. If testimony on one side was to be read here, the other side should also have the opportunity to take testimony to rebut it. He took it that no man was prepared to vote for hearing testimony on one side, who would not be willing to hold the case open until the whole testimony could be presented on both sides. For himself, he would prefer another course of proceeding; but as the Administration party preferred this course, and seemed to be willing to take the responsibility of it upon themselves, he would vote for the reading of these papers. The only difficulty with him, was, that the question had not been presented fairly to the House. When it was presented fairly, there would rest upon the House such a responsibility as had never before rested upon it. It would then be for the majority to say, whether, in cases like these, the regular certificates of the properly constituted authorities shall be passed by, in order that the House may try the rights of members to seats upon the volunteer certificates of persons unknown here, and only under the obligations of an oath before a justice of the peace. Mr. G. contended that the passing over regular certificates was a dangerous precedent, and cited cases to show what a tendency it might have. He contended, if this doctrine was once established, the votes of whole States might be thrown away in cases where the election of a President devolved upon the House of Representatives. Delaware, Michigan, and Arkansas were each represented on this floor by a single Representative; and in case of a warmly contested Presidential election, where the decision of the question would eventually devolve upon the House of Representatives, perjury might procure sufficient affidavits to prevent the members from those States from voting upon the election of a President, if this new doctrine was once established.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said the question was, whether the papers on the Clerk's table should be read by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN.] They were papers that went to show, that, according to the ballot boxes, a majority of the popular vote was given for Mr. DICKERSON and his associates. If this point were well established here, either by evidence such as would satisfy the conscience of any reasonable man, or by the admission of the parties interested, or their friend, the only uncontested member from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] he thought the House would immediately be prepared to act, not only upon this question of order, but upon the point, which set of gentlemen should be regarded as the legal and genuine members of this House. The position which he (Mr. V.) took when he submitted his first remarks on Tuesday last, was, that if the House could be convinced that Mr. DICKERSON and his associates had actually received the majority of the popular vote as canvassed by the board of canvassers, who presided over the boxes, and whose duty it was to receive and canvass the votes, and pass upon the qualifications of the voters, it would be its duty, at once, to do what the Governor had done; give them, as the lawyers would say, their certificate, nunc pro tunc, and let them take their seats. In order to ascertain these questions of facts clearly and distinctly, he would propound to the gentlsman from New Jersey, before him, [Mr. RANDOLPH] a few questions. The first question he would ask that honorable gentleman was, whether, according to the ballot boxes, and the canvass made by the canvassing officers who received the votes, Mr. DICKERSON and his associates did not receive a majority of the popular votes?

Mr. RANDOLPH answered yes; that, including the voters who were disqualified, and had no right to vote, they did.

The next question he would ask the gentleman, was, whether if the towns of Millville and South Amboy were included, Messrs. DICKERSON and his associates would have a majority of the popular vote?

Mr. RANDOLPH responded that they would; that he would not deny that the towns of Millville and South Amboy were excluded by the Governor and Privy Council in casting up the votes.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would ask another question for information from the gentleman. After the board of canvassers, the primary tribunal, had canvassed the votes and returned their certificate of the votes to the county clerks, could the county clerks, or the Governor and Privy Council, according to the laws of New Jersey, go into the ballot boxes and reject votes, on the ground that the votes of aliens or other disqualified persons had entered the boxes.

Mr. RANDOLPH was about to rise, and

Mr. WISE here arose and objected to this course of catechism as being out of order; and while he was proceeding to show that it was not in order,

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would waive the question and answer it himself.

Mr. V. said that he had heard much about "leaping over the law," but he was induced to ask this question in order to show that these gentlemen, who were now such sticklers for the laws of New Jersey, were themselves sanctioning a most palpable violation of law; but as gentlemen objected to the question, it was needless to press it, and more especially, as he, in common with every other gentleman on this floor who could read the English language, could answer it. He had merely questioned the gentleman, in order to have the irresistible conclusion of that gentleman's mind, superadded to the clear interpretation of a statute of his own State. Let gentlemen read the law of New Jersey, and they will look in vain there for any authority on the part of the mere returning officers, the clerks of counties, or the Governor and Privy Council, to enter the ballot boxes, and reject votes, on the ground that voters were disqualified. They were mere returning officers, and, could not arrest votes on their way to this House, the only appellate court, after the primary court, the board of canvassers, the keepers of the ballot boxes, had passed upon their qualifications. No one had pretended, no gentleman could pretend, that the county clerks and Governor and Privy Council, could act in a judicial capacity, and purge the polls. These, then, were most important admissions, made by the only undisputed member from New Jersey, and the ardent friend and supporter of the claims of the Governor's members. We now could have no further dispute, either about the facts of the case, or the law of New Jersey. They were not only incontestably proved by the papers on the CLERK's table, but were unequivocally admitted by the sole Representative of the State in question. What course, then, should we pursue in relation to reading papers?

Here Mr. V. said he would state how far he thought we ought to tolerate the reading of papers in this our state of preliminary organization. He had no doubt we were competent to try the whole case after the roll was called and before a Speaker was chosen; but the argument of inconvenience might, and as he thought should, deter us from going into the question of disqualified voters before the House was fully organized, because we had no Committee of Elections, and that question generally depended upon voluminous and conflicting testimony, upon the consideration of which it might be very inconvenient to enter before a complete organization. But this objection did not apply to the reading of papers designed to show the simple proposition that one or the other set of gentlemen, according to the ballot boxes, received a majority of the votes. This generally was, and in this case was most emphatically a question capable of proof by a mere isolated document, return, or other paper, and in this case was proved not only by such document, but by the admission of the member from New Jersey himself, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] Was there, he put it to the consciences of gentlemen, any dispute about the all important question of fact, that the Governor's members did not, according to the votes as canvassed, receive a majority of the votes given in the State? What was, then, the safe course, the course, he had almost said, to which imperious duty impelled the House in this case? Was it proper to discuss this point upon this mere question of order? Other gentlemen had pointed their remarks to the main question, and while he was up, he would tell the House what he thought we were imperiously called upon to do, as matter of warning and example to county clerks, Governors, and other mere returning officers; yes, called upon to do as a caution to some future Governor Pennington, or some clerk Fithian, that they, mere returning officers, could not suppress the voice of the ballot boxes, and for a moment give seats to mere pretenders on the ground that the ballot boxes contained votes that ought never to have been given. Let it once go forth that partisan clerks and partisan Governors can for an instant defeat the voice of the people, and no gentleman, a candidate for the honor of a seat here, could have a complete guarantee that he would be permitted to take it at the opening of Congress, though elected by a majority never so large. We should do then what the Governor and Privy Council should have done—give the gentlemen the certificate or seats who, according to the returns and record and truth before them, ought to have had it; and then, if the minority candidates want to purge the polls, let them approach us by petition; or, at least, tell all the candidates to stand back until the House, by a complete organization, shall acquire facilities to look into the whole case. The course proposed by those who supported the pretensions of the Governor's members, would hold out most dangerous temptations to these mere ministerial officers to commit frauds. They could, under most frivolous pretexts, give to minority candidates certificates, enable them to aid us in the organization of the House, and, peradventure, to sit with us here, and exclude the true members for months; for those gentlemen who had had any experience of cases of contested elections, knew how slowly they generally progressed here. He would then place, at this stage of our proceedings, all the papers that went to show what was the popular voice, as expressed through the ballot boxes, and would not now consent to hear any affidavits that went beyond them. He had learned that the Governor's members, either to cover their retreat, or to supply themselves with the semblance of a pretext for claiming their seats, had recently taken some testimony under a law lately passed by the Legislature of New Jersey; that they had sat very quietly for nearly a year, and then conceived this after thought. He would not, before organization, give them the benefit of this after thought, but would, for the safety of all future candidates, first purge the case of the fraud of the mere ministerial and returning officers. Duty and example required this.

Much had been said about the character of the testimony on the CLERK'S table, whether it was legal testimony. He had heard much here, not only of the common law, but of evidence taken according to the common law. The common law was first drawn into the service by his friend and colleague, [Mr. BARNARD,] who delivered so terse and so clear an argument last week—as good an argument as could well be made on the wrong side. Mr. V. asked pardon for this digression. It was dictated by his heart. His colleague and he had been classmates in their boyhood, they had journeyed together through the delightful classic tale of Æneas and Anchises, and it gave him pride and pleasure to witness efforts from him, here or elsewhere, that were creditable. Why was the evidence to prove the actual majority insufficient? Was it because it did not come up to the mark of strict sense, common law evidence? Was it not enough to satisfy our consciences? Did we ever exact more than this in the discharge of our legislative duties? Ask your Committees of Claims what evidence they act upon, what testimony it is, upon which millions of dollars have been voted away to satisfy claims on the Government? They will tell you that all that they require is to be convinced, and that this conviction is generally induced by affidavits taken ex parte, before magistrates, in an extra judicial form; and for the making of which, no indictment can be had for perjury. Do you still doubt where he truth and justice of the case, in reference to the votes actually given, lies? Do you doubt the evidence on the CLERK'S table? Do you doubt the answer of the member from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOPH?]

Mr. EVERETT had no objection to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] having the documents read, which he had called upon the CLERK to read, if they were to be published as a part of his speech, but he contended that they could not be received as evidence before the House in the case now at issue. Let the matter be argued as it would, the question would come back in the end to the certificate of the Governor of New Jersey, and if that was in the form required by the laws, the House would be compelled to admit the members from New Jersey holding those certificates. With regard to the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] he looked upon it as an argument to the people, and contended that the admissions of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] could have no weight upon the House in coming to a decision. The positions of the gentleman from New York with regard to the members claiming seats, having a majority of the votes of the people, were groundless.

Mr. VANDERPOEL stated that his position was that the county clerk and Governor were mere returned officers who had no right to go behind the certificates.

Mr. EVERETT held that the returning officer to this House, under the laws of New Jersey, was the Governor of the State, and his certificate was only to be set aside by the House after it was organized, and if gentlemen attempted to pursue the course indicated on this floor, they would overleap the barriers of the laws, and introduce a precedent which would lead to consequences which ought to be dreaded by all the friends of liberty throughout the country. Mr. E. pursued his argument at some length, but in so low a tone of voice that it was impossible for the Reporter to follow him.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON of Maryland next obtained the floor, when

Mr. BLACK of Georgia rose, and stated that his colleague had been anxious to obtain the floor, and he thought it but right that he should now be heard in preference to gentlemen who had spoken three or four times.

Loud cries of "Order, order, order!" were heard in various parts of the hall.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON stated that he had not spoken on the question before the CHAIR at present; and if the CHAIR decided that he was entitled to the floor, he certainly would not yield it.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Maryland was entitled to the floor.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he had predicted on the first day of the session, that the first step which would be taken contrary to the regular course of proceedings, would lead us into endless difficulties and confusion; and when we should be extricated from those difficulties, must be answered by those who had placed the House in this awkward position. He contended that the majority of the House had taken this course for sinister and party purposes, and they should be held responsible to the country for it. The CLERK of the House had been made a supple tool of party, and by his course he had arrested the whole business of the House, and with it the whole operations of the Government; and the people would hold the CLERK and his friends responsible for this course of conduct. He contended that it was a useless waste of the time of the House to have the CLERK reading certificates, which the House itself could not act upon; for he held that they had no authority and no power to act upon the case until the House was regularly organized, and the oath of office had been administered to the members of the House. With regard to the argument that the New Jersey members might vote on preliminary questions, and not upon the election of a Speaker, he considered it entirely groundless. They were either members or not members, because we could have no quasi members in the House. If they have the proper credentials, and he contended they had, they were entitled to the same rights and privileges of any other members. He would stand by the uniform usages in cases of this kind; and, so far as he was concerned, he would never depart from them. He would never consent to any compromise of the question, because he believed the members from New Jersey to be entitled to their seats, upon the evidence which they had produced, and we had no right to go behind that evidence at the present time.

Mr. COLQUITT thought gentlemen had spent time enough there in debate to effect party purposes, and suggested that the better course for those gentlemen who yet desired to speak, would be to spread before the world their views through other channels. With regard to the settlement of the main question at issue, he thought the House entirely unfitted to settle it until after its organization, and contended that it would just be as competent for a judge who had been elected by the people to take evidence and decide upon a case before he had taken the oath of office, as it would be for this House to decide upon the New Jersey case before it had organized, and before the members had taken the oath of office. The House might go on, and hear evidence, and debate upon it, for a week or a month; but it all amounted to nothing, because it was not competent to decide upon the question at the present time. We might hear testimony, and make up our opinions with regard to it, but we had no more power to decide upon it than the judge would have to decide in the case which he had just referred to. We have no judicial power to decide questions, and can have none until we are regularly installed into office; and was useless for gentlemen to be presenting testimony to the House at the present time. He wished to pursue that course pointed out by the Constitution and the laws, and called upon gentlemen not to set precedents which might break down all the barriers of the Constitution. The Constitution and the laws were the protection of the minority, and he begged of gentlemen in the majority, when they attempted to overstep their bounds, to reflect that they themselves may one day be in the minority, and they will then look to them as their only protection. He looked upon those persons who held the certificates under the laws of New Jersey, as entitled to all the rights and privileges of members of this House, until their case was decided upon in a legal and constitutional manner. With regard to the testimony which had been read from the Clerk's table, it seemed to be altogether ex parte; and if this House permitted a member to be deprived of any of his rights upon ex parte testimony, it will be in the power of persons who may desire to do so, to defeat the organization of the House at any of its sessions. It was an easy matter at any time to get up ex parte statements, and it seemed to him to be a most extraordinary proposition to attempt to deprive members of their rights upon such testimony as this. It had been contended by some gentlemen that the power to examine into this question at the present time was a power incident to organization; but he held that we had no power, previous to organization, to examine testimony and decide upon a case of this kind. That could only be done after the House was organized, and after the members had taken the official oath; then they would be competent to decide judicially, and not till then.

Mr. NISBET of Georgia addressed the House at some length, in opposition to the reading of the documents. Mr. N. defined his position as a State Rights man, and declared that as such he must go for those gentlemen taking their seats who hold certificates, in conformity with the laws of New Jersey, which he considered paramount here on the question involved. He considered that the House, in its present incomplete state of organization, had the power of comparing the evidence adduced by the contending claimants, and of deciding which possessed the prima facie evidence; but the House could not, in his opinion, until after its organization, go behind the returns and purge the polls, to ascertain who had a majority of the popular vote. Congress had now only the parliamentary powers necessary for its organization. Mr. N. gave it as his opinion that the New Jersey members had not the power of voting, till their right to the seats they claimed was decided in their favor. In this opinion, he considered himself sustained by parliamentary law, and parliamentary usage, and in support of it, he referred to the resolution introduced last winter by the CHAIR. While he believed that it was the duty of the House to enforce the laws and Constitution of New Jersey, he, at the same time, believed that the New Jersey members should not vote until these laws were enforced.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia begged leave to occupy the attention of the House for a short time. Before he proceeded, he owed, he said, an apology to the House, and particularly to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] for the manner in which he, for the first time, presented himself to its notice. He meant no disrespect to any body here. He only claimed the right of himself and his colleagues to be heard, when other gentlemen were wandering from the incidental question before them, speaking on the merits of the main question. He only meant to go so far as to say that any gentleman who spoke on the question might be mistaken; and he would leave it to the House, if all the gentlemen who spoke last, had not gone into the merits of the main question—and he would ask, further, if he was wrong in desiring that the State of Georgia should be heard.

He desired, at this time, to exhibit the position in which, as a member from the State of Georgia, he stood on that floor. It was true that his credentials had not been read; it was true that there was no man here from Georgia contesting his right to his seat; but he did not know how soon it might be contested, if the precedent gentlemen sought to introduce should be established.

He understood the question then before the House to be whether the gentleman from Ohio should be, permitted to go on with his evidence. If that was the question he was prepared to meet it. Laying all other matters aside, and stripping it of all disguise, he was prepared to answer distinctly to this body in the negative. Shall we (said Mr. B.) hear evidence on the one side or the other before we are constitutionally capable of acting on it? Will you hear the merits of the case, before you are in a condition to decide upon it? This was a question of high concern to the country—a question which involved the constitutional rights of the States, and citizens of States; and it was propounded, to whom? To an assemblage of citizens merely—to men who, though they may hereafter be Representattves in the Congress of the United States, have not only not been sworn in as such, but have not even presented the prima facie evidence of their right to be here. Admitting, said Mr. B. that there were Representatives, who knows the fact, but those gentlemen themselves who have their credentials in their pockets? Admit that we have no other contest but that in regard to the seats of the members from New Jersey. I put it to your wisdom, sir, whether we are organized, in accordance with the Constitution and the law, and whether we can take cognisance of any matter, either in our legislative or judicial capicity, until we are so? If we are to arrive at that point of our legislative existence, at which our powers as members of the General Government begin, we must take the only practical course, and that is the usual and ordinary one heretofore pursued by this House. The only way is for the CLERK to call the roll of the members of the House, beginning if he pleases with the State of Maine, and going on in geographical order, until the whole roll is completed; then the members must be sworn. There is no other power that can settle this question but the House of Representatives; and the Constitution gives it to that House alone. What is a House of Representatives, in the meaning of the Constiution? Members chosen every two years by the citizens of the States? No—you must go farther; you must have a majority, and the members must take the oath to support the Constitution, and then proceed to organize the body before it can be called a House of Representatives.

We have been here seven days, wasting the time and money of the nation, and have not arrived at the only material point—that of organization. All the debate that has hitherto occurred, was idle and unprofitable. He himself was now speaking by the mere courtesy of the House, and until, said he, we arrive at the point of organization, all our talk will be mere talk. In order that we may arrive at that point, permit me to address myself to the majority. It is said that one of the political parties of the day has a majority on this floor; if that be the truth, the whole responsibility for the waste of time and waste of money of the nation will rest upon them. Go on, therefore, I beseech you, gentlemen of the majority, to organize this body—to put it in such a state of constitutional existence as will enable it to decide upon the questions thus prematurely put before it. I call upon that majority to reflect what may be the opinion entertained of them if they exclude these five New Jersey members from the fear that if they are admitted they may not be able to elect a Speaker of their party. Go on then gentlemen to organize—admit these men to their seats; and if an Opposition Speaker is elected by their votes, the election may be undone to-morrow. Mr. B. said he had as yet only spoken on the preliminary question, and what might be his opinions, and what his votes, in regard to the ultimate right of the claimants to the seats from New Jersey, he was prepared when that question should come properly before them to do what law and justice required. After the House should be organized, he was willing to open that case—he would be willing to hear the evidence, and to decide who are the rightful Representatives from the State of New Jersey. He would be willing to examine the facts as to who had the majority of the popular vote, and to accord the seats to hose who should be found to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD believed that the question before the House was, whether the papers the gentleman from Ohio proposed to have read as a part of his speech, should be read or not. He was against the reading of them, as well as against the reading of the papers which his worthy colleague wished to have read as counteracting testimony, and his objections were founded on the simple reason that there was no tribunal as yet constituted to decide on them. It seemed to him that this discussion had been carried too far. The gentleman with whom he acted had acted throughout from principle. We have shown, said he, that if you refuse to give the contested seats to those who hold the regular commissions, you are out at sea without chart of compass. The House could not, until organized, go behind the regular commissions of the State of New Jersey. At present, however, the whole and sole question should be, How shall we proceed to an organization of the body? On this subject he wished to make a few remarks before he moved the previous question, (which he should presently do,) and he wished to suggest some mode of action after he did call for it. He trusted that he held in his hand a resolution which would relieve the House from every difficulty, and which he also trusted would meet the approbation of a majority of those present. He did not pretend to say that his plan was the best that could be offered; but he would cheerfully surrender it to any better. We have already, said he, expended twenty thousand dollars of the people's money to no purpose, while we have been consuming time in useless debate; and what is worse, we have stood in the way of the interests of the public, by preventing the annual message of the President, on the condition of the country, from going before them. Let us, then, said he, no longer waste time in discussion, but proceed at once to the organization of the House, for the despatch of the public business. My plan, then, said Mr. U. is to move the previous question on all questions before the House, and then to submit the resolution I hold in my hand to the following effect: The Clerk shall again commence calling the roll of members, beginning with the State of Maine, and going on geographically through each State, until he comes to a name that shall be objected to; and when that is the case he shall pass over that name, and proceed to call all the rest, passing over such as are objected to. He did not care whether the CLERK, when he came to New Jersey, called the names of Mr. AYCRIGG and his associates, or Mr. DICKERSON and his associates. The effect would be the same, as he was to pass over all the names to which objection should be made. The CLERK, then, would go on calling the roll until he called the names of all the members whose seats were not contested, and when a quorum was thus formed, it should then decide upon the credentials of all those whose seats were contested. After that, said Mr. U. we shall then go on to elect a Speaker, when some member present, having administered the oath to him, he will administer it to all the rest, and we shall then be an organized body, competent to the transaction of the public business. Mr. U. concluded by moving the previous question on the reading of the documentary testimony called for by Mr. DUNCAN.

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the House, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The main question was then taken by tellers Messrs. FRANCIS THOMAS and TILLINGHAST acting as such.

Which main question was, whether the gentleman from Ohio should be permitted to read the documentary testimony.

Which question was decided in the affirmative, ayes 106, nays 101.

The CLERK then proceeded to read the testimony, and having commenced the reading of the proceedings of the Privy Council on the Millville and South Amboy polls,

Mr. PROFFIT objected to the further reading, and asked if the paper now being read was not brought and placed on file in the Clerk's office on Saturday last. He saw it himself handed to the CLERK on Saturday last by one of the gentlemen from New Jersey. He objected to its reading and moved that it be thrown under the table.

Mr. DUNCAN hoped the CHAIRMAN would order the reading to go on without interruption.

The CHAIR said the decision of the House, just made, allowed the gentleman to read all the documents on file.

The CLERK then went on with the reading of the documents until he finished; when—

Mr. DUNCAN observed that he felt as anxious a desire to organize the House, and place themselves in a condition to transact the public business as any member on that floor. He heard the suggestions of the gentleman from Kentucky, and was pleased with them; and if assured that these resolutions could be adopted without giving rise to a long debate, he would yield his right to the floor to allow them to be offered Without some such understanding, however, he would not yield the floor.

Mr. MERCER observed that the gentleman had no right to make such compromise with the House. He, for his part, could not agree to it; and further, he did not intend to vote for the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. DUNCAN. Then I withdraw my offer.

After which, Mr. D. gave way for a motion for adjournment, which was moved and carried;

The House then adjourned till to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 10, 1839.

Mr. ALLEN, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President, reported that they had performed that duty; and the President informed them that he had communications of an Executive character to make.

Mr. LINN gave notice that, at the earliest day in which it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the occupation of the Oregon Territory.

A message was received from the President of the United States.

The Senate went into Executive business,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
TUESDAY, December 10, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, by the House clock, the CHAIR called the House to order, and stated that the question pending was upon the appeal taken by Mr. VANDERPOEL from the decision of the CHAIR, which decision was, that Messrs. AYCRIGG, HALSTED, &c. of New Jersey, were entitled to vote.

The CHAIR announced that Mr. DUNCAN of Ohio was entitled to the floor upon this question—not having concluded his remarks on a former day.

Mr. DUNCAN not appearing in his seat,

Mr. WISE rose and said, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was in the House he would not do what he was about to do; but if the gentleman was not in the House he would now move the previous question.

Mr. DROMGOOLE stated that there was a difference in the time between the House clock and gentlemen's timepieces, and he hoped his colleagues would wait a few minutes to see if the gentleman from Ohio would not come in.

Mr. WISE thought perhaps that the absence of the gentleman from Ohio was intentional, with a view of permitting the question to be taken; but if any gentleman would inform him that the gentleman from Ohio wished to address the House, he would wait with pleasure. In order that the gentleman might have an opportunity to come in, he hoped the CHAIR would leave the question to lie over a few minutes, or, if gentlemen requested it, he would withdraw the motion for the present, and move it afterwards.

Mr. JENIFER inquired of the gentleman from Virginia if it was his intention to move the previous question immediately after the gentleman from Ohio had finished his speech, so that there might be no opportunity to reply to him; first to permit the gentleman to make a speech, and then move it to prevent its being answered?

Mr. WISE. I tell the honorable gentleman that I intend to move the previous question every time that I get the chance.

Mr. JENIFER. Then I now demand the previous question, for, if the gentleman is allowed to make a speech, the opportunity ought to be given to reply to it.

Mr. WISE hoped the CHAIR would pause a few moments until gentlemen's watches come up to the House time.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Is it in order to move a call of the House?

Mr. WISE. There is no House to call.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. If there is no House, gentlemen ought to be solemnly called upon to be here to form a House.

Mr. MERCER said his own impression was that no injustice would be done to the gentleman from Ohio by moving the previous question, as there would be a dozen other questions to come up upon which the gentleman could finish his speech.

The CHAIR stated the course of proceeding on a call of the House, namely: The roll was called over and the absentees noted; and in the present case, if the roll was to be called, the original question of difficulty would arise as to who should be called.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Then this will bring the House to the question, which the House itself must eventually decide, as to who are its members.

Mr. CHINN then rose, and, walking towards the CLERK's table, said there had been a great deal of difficulty in determining who were really members of this House, which had determined him as to the course which ought to be pursued. Sir, (said Mr. C.) I hold in my hand the authority by which I come here to represent the people of my State. That authority I now present to the CHAIR, and demand to be enrolled as a member from the State of Louisiana; and I further propose, in the discharge of my duty as a Representative, to give in my vote for Speaker of the House. If the vote is to be by ballot, there is my ballot, [handing up the ticket;] if viva voce, I vote for JOHN BELL of Tennessee.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Has not the gentleman's name been enrolled before?

Mr. CHINN. No: it has neither been enrolled nor called by the CLERK.

Mr. WISE. It is now past twelve o'clock by the Administration time, and that must be right. I therefore now move the previous question.

A call of the house was demanded by several gentlemen.

The CHAIR stated that the roll of members had not been completed; therefore, a call of the House could not be made.

Tellers were then called for, and Messrs. CARTER of Tennessee, and GRIFFIN, were appointed tellers by the CHAIR.

The House then divided, and the previous question was seconded—ayes 110, noes 72.

The question then recurred on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Messrs. WORTHINGTON and TALIAFERRO were appointed tellers, and the main question was ordered to be put—ayes 110, noes 48.

Mr. WORTHINGTON stated that three of the New Jersey members had voted on this question.

[Mr. DUNCAN now appeared in the House.]

Mr. SMITH of Maine rose and stated, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was now in his seat, and he asked whether he should not now be permitted to proceed.

[Loud cries of "order!" "order!" "order!"]

Mr. DUNCAN. I put a question of order to the CHAIR.

[Loud and repeated cries of "order!" "order!" "order!"]

The question then recurred on the main question

The CHAIR then stated the main question in substance as follows: Upon a motion to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table, the vote was about being taken by tellers. One of the tellers inquired who were entitled to vote from New Jersey, and the CHAIR had decided that those members holding the Governor's certificate were entitled to vote. From this decision an appeal to the House had been taken by the gentleman from New York. The question now was, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?"

The House then divided; Messrs. WORTHINGTON and TALIAFERRO acting as tellers; and the vote was—ayes 108, noes 114.

So the decision of the CHAIR was reversed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON stated that there were four members voting who hold the Governor's certificate.

A number of persons called out, "How many were voting who hold the certificates of the Secretary of State?" and Mr. CURTIS answered "four."

Mr. SMITH of Maine. It is no matter. It don't change the result.

The CHAIR then stated that it would be for the meeting to decide who should be called as members from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. RHETT inquired of the CHAIR if the question did not now recur on the motion made by him to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table?

The CHAIR stated that that would be the question if there was no other question in the way; but the question now was, who should be counted from the State of New Jersey, the decision of the CHAIR having been reversed.

Mr. RHETT asked if the question was not precisely this: A motion had been made by himself to lay the resolution of the gentlemen from Virginia on the table. Upon a division on that question, the CHAIR had decided that the members from New Jersey having the Governor's certificate were to be counted. From that decision an appeal had been taken to the House; and the House had reversed the decision of the CHAIR. Then he asked if the House would not come back to the original motion to lay on the table?

Mr. WISE asked if, when the House had excluded one set of gentlemen from New Jersey from voting, it had not excluded all from that State from voting. It had excluded those gentlemen holding the Governor's certificate from voting. Now was it the intention of gentlemen to permit those persons holding the certificate of the Secretary of State to vote?

"No," "no," "no," from several Administration members.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said all difficulty might now be avoided, by going on as the CLERK had proposed in the first instance, without counting any of the disputed gentlemen from New Jersey.

Mr. WISE. This was the decision of the CLERK, but was it the decision of the House? Let us attempt to progress as we may, this ghost of disorganization will rise up before us, and we will then have to decide who shall vote.

The CHAIR would here remark to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] that it would be impossible for him to put the question upon laying the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table, until it was determined by the House who should vote. It would be for the House to decide for themselves who should be called; but, said he, the State of New Jersey cannot be deprived of a representation on this floor, and it shall not be, so long as I stand in this chair.

[Here there was some little applause from the galleries.]

Mr. WISE. I move the previous question on the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS of Maryland suggested a mode of proceeding without difficulty. We ought to endeavor to get along without difficulty, until it could be no longer avoided, and then it would be time enough to decide upon this question. Let the vote be taken on the motion to lay on the table, by tellers; and if the fact of any portion of the members from New Jersey voting should not change the result, let the decision of the question be announced without raising this question; but if, by their votes, the result is changed, then it will be time enough to bring up this question as to who shall vote. He threw this out as a suggestion to the House.

Mr. WISE called for the regular order of proceedings. The CHAIR had made his decision, and he (Mr. W.) had moved the previous question upon it. Then he demanded that the regular order of proceedings might be observed.

Mr. BRIGGS. On what question does the gentleman move the previous question?

The CHAIR said the gentleman had moved the previous question on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WISE. No, sir. I understood the CHAIR to make a decision as to who should vote, and upon that decision I moved the previous question.

The CHAIR then again stated the question as he had stated it before, and concluded by saying that the House had reversed his decision; but it had not determined who should be counted from New Jersey, and he could not put the question to lay on the table until the question as to who should vote from New Jersey should first be decided.

Messrs. BRIGGS, TILLINGHAST, and WISE, all rose and addressed the CHAIR. Half the members of the House were standing up.

Mr. SERGEANT rose and said there were so many members on the floor, and so much noise in the hall, that it was impossible for gentlemen to tell what was doing. He hoped members would take their seats.

Mr. BRIGGS then rose and stated his impressions as to the question before the House. A motion had been made to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table. On that question tellers were appointed; and when the House was about dividing, one of the tellers inquired who he should count from the State of New Jersey. The CHAIR decided that the tellers should count the members from that State who had the Governor's certificates. From this decision an appeal had been taken, and the House had reversed the decision of the CHAIR. Then, he apprehended, they stood precisely where they did when this appeal was taken; and the question now would be upon the motion to lay on the table; and he thought the proper course now would be for the tellers to count all who passed through, and if any of the disputed members should vote, let them report that fact to the House. He hoped that the CHAIR would direct the tellers to count all who passed through.

Mr. SALTONSTALL hoped that no such direction would be given.

The CHAIR said he had made his decision—that decision had been reversed; and it would now be for the House to decide who should represent the State of New Jersey.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought the CHAIR ought not to put the question on the motion to lay on the table until the House had decided who should vote from the State of New Jersey. The appeal from the decision had been sustained, and it had been sustained, if we looked at the argument upon it, upon two grounds. One was that the matter was a proper subject for the House to determine, and the other was that the decision was incorrect, whether by the CHAIR or the House.

Mr. TURNEY rose to a point of order. The question, as he understood it, was to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table; and the question to lay on the table, according to the rules, was not debatable.

The CHAIR said that the question as to who were to represent the State of New Jersey must first be decided, before the question to lay on the table come up.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said that the CHAIR had directed that the gentlemen from New Jersey were entitled to vote. An appeal had been taken from that decision, and it had been reversed, and the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. TILLINGHAST] had attempted to give the reasons for this vote of the House; but he would tell the gentleman that the strongest reason which operated upon him, was the 34th rule of the House. He thought the House had a right to decide under that rule, when gentlemen were directly, personally, and immediately interested, that they should not vote. He believed that many other gentlemen besides himself had voted against the decision of the CHAIR in consequence of this rule.

Mr. McKAY moved that none of the disputed members from New Jersey be permitted to vote until the question was decided.

Mr. GRAVES rose to a question of order. His point was this: there was a question before the House, and the previous question had been moved upon it; therefore, no gentleman had the right to bring up a separate and independent proposition until that question was disposed of.

The CHAIR said the previous question could not be put until this question as to who should represent the State of New Jersey should first be decided.

Mr. McKAY then moved that neither set of members from New Jersey shall vote until the question who shall vote from the State of New Jersey? shall be first decided by the House. He contended that this was the proper course to be pursued, and read an extract from Hatzell in support of his position. It was the uniform practice in the British Parliament, when seats were contested, that both parties should withdraw until their case was decided by those who were not personally interested in the matter. This was the only correct and proper course to be pursued, and he hoped his proposition would be agreed to by the House. He also referred to the case of Howell and Everett of Rhode Island, in the continental Congress, which had been cited by the CHAIRMAN, and showed that the Rhode Island members did not vote on their own case in the first instance. Subsequently, however, they did vote upon such questions as were presented.

Mr. PROFFIT rose to appeal from the decision of the CHAIR. ["What decision?" from different parts of the House.]

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON rose and stated that he held in his hand a series of resolutions to offer, which would bring the House directly to a vote on the question at issue. [Cries of "order, order, order!"]

Mr. PETRIKIN rose to a point of order. He wished to know whether it was competent for the CHAIR to entertain three or four propositions at one time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the gentleman reduce his point of order to writing.

The CHAIR requested that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON would say what he had to say upon his resolution, while the gentleman was preparing his point of order. Mr. J. held that the House had not the right to vote out the Representatives of an entire State. The House must conform to the Constitution and the laws, and they expressly inhibited the House from taking such a course, unless the members were sworn in. He contended that they could not adopt the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, because, by the law of apportioning Representatives, New Jersey was entitled to six Representatives, and it was not in the power of this House to deprive her of that representation.

Mr. PETRIKIN then presented his point of order in writing; but

The CHAIR decided against it, because the question to lay on the table could not be pending while the preliminary question was undecided.

Mr. PETRIKIN raised an additional point of order, as to whether any other motion could be made, which would set aside that motion. If such was the decision of the CHAIR, he would appeal from that decision.

The CHAIR said that whatever question might arise, the moment the House came to vote upon it, the question would arise as to who should vote upon it; and the question as to who should vote, must be settled before the question to lay on the table can be put.

Mr. RHETT thought the proper course would be to decide one question at a time. Mr. R. went over, and summed up the various questions presented to the CHAIR, and concluded by moving the previous question on the appeal taken by Mr. PETRIKIN.

Mr. BRIGGS contended that as the question pending was on the motion of Mr. McKAY, an appeal could not be taken on any other question.

The CHAIR then decided that Mr. PETRIKIN'S motion could not be entertained.

Mr. PETRIKIN. Then I appeal from that decision.

[Loud cries of "order!" "order!" "order!"]

Mr. JOHNSON then asked for the reading of his resolution.

Mr. BYNUM objected to this course of piling motion upon motion. If we did not go on and decide questions according to some rule of order, it would be utterly impossible to do any thing.

Mr. JOHNSON said he offered his resolution as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. J's resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved, That a certificate of election as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, duly made, in conformity with the laws of the State which the parties profess to represent, and signed by the proper officers under the great seal of the State, is sufficient per se to entitle the person to whom it is given to be sworn in as a member of the House, provided that no State shall have more Representatives than is allowed to it by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Resolved, That, under the fifth section of the second article of the Constitution, the House of Representatives of the United States can only look beyond such certificate, and judge of the election, returns, and qualifications, of its own members, after it shall have been organized and sworn.

Mr. JOHNSON said he offered this proposition as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, because he felt that he could not vote on the motion of that gentleman. We have not yet been sworn; we have not taken the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and he could not consent to see the House proceed to the solemn farce or mockery of voting the Representatives of a whole State out of this House, when the members of the House were not under the moral and religious obligations required by the Constitution.

The CHAIR said he did not feel authorized to entertain a resolution, the effect of which would be to deprive the State of New Jersey of her representation on this floor. It was not competent for this meeting to pass such a resolution. The resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina declared, in effect, that the people of the State of New Jersey should not be represented on this floor, and the CHAIR could not put the question, upon such a resolution, to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I will offer my resolution as a separate and distinct proposition. In reply to a proposition which had been made by some gentlemen on the floor, that all the members from New Jersey might vote, provided the result was not changed, he wished to say a few words. New Jersey was entitled to but six Representatives under the laws apportioning Representatives, and he held that it would be a monstrous innovation for the House to permit eleven members from that State to vote. That State was entitled to six Representatives, and she was entitled to no more: and the question here was, who those six Representatives should be? This question was settled by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey, and it was incompetent for this House to take any question upon that until it was first organized, and gentlemen had taken the oath of office.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS rose to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. McKAY] to withdraw his proposition, in order that another effort might be made to settle this question. Mr. T. said he had moved no preliminary proposition, he had offered no amendments to propositions which had been before the House; not because he had not felt deeply interested in the questions—not because he did not feel a deep anxiety to see the House organized in an orderly manner, and at an early day, but because he believed that all the preliminary questions had a tendency to postpone the organization of the body. He believed that a large majority of the members of the House had made up their minds as to how they would vote on this question, in any shape which it might assume. Then let it be the effort of every gentleman to bring the House to action. What was the course best calculated to do so? Was it best for us to be chasing shadows and discussing questions which may never arise? We would have difficulties enough, by pursuing a straight forward course, without stepping aside to raise difficulties which were not in our way. He knew that there were members here who held the opinion that four of these New Jersey members could vote upon the right of the fifth to take his seat. This was not his opinion; but he proposed to avoid, if possible, that and other such questions, because if we went on to discuss them, as we had done, we might be discussing here till doomsday without arriving at any practical result. The course, then, which he intended to pursue was, not to moot preliminary questions unnecessarily. Let the vote be taken. It was possible, when it was taken, that the case would stand as it stood to-day. It may be that the votes of the five disputed members from New Jersey would not change the result, whether counted or not. When the vote was taken this morning, it appeared that four of the disputed New Jersey members had voted, but their votes could not change the result, therefore no objection had been made from any quarter to their voting. By this course, the House may avoid deciding on these vexed preliminary questions, and he thought every gentleman ought to endeavor to avoid them if possible; the public interest required this; but if they were to be decided on, let them be decided on when the necessity for it arises. It will be time enough, then, to decide on them.

With regard to the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, it, in his opinion, decided nothing. That proposition, as stated verbally, is, in effect, that the members from New Jersey shall not vote until the House decides that they shall vote. Well, suppose this proposition should be adopted by the House, it would be a mere abstraction. The House must then go a step further, and say whether they shall vote or not. It will be competent, then, for gentlemen to say that he (Mr. T.) should not vote until the House decided that he should vote. The same objection might be raised to any other gentleman's right to vote, and day after day would be spent in these preliminary questions, and no good would result from it. Then let us meet the question to-day, and come up to the question which is best calculated to avoid all difficulty. Let us take the vote to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table, or to reject it; and if the vote of the disputed members from

New Jersey does not change the result, let the decision of the House be pronounced without raising these preliminary questions of abstract right which serve but little practical purpose. This course had been suggested by the CHAIR some days ago as the proper course to be pursued, and he hoped the House would take up this suggestion and act upon it now. In urging this course upon the House, he would state that his sole object was to bring the House to action and avoid those difficulties in which the House had been long involved, to the injury of the public service, and at the risk of its own dignity and capacity for future usefulness.

Mr. WISE would suggest a course by which the House might arrive at a speedy termination of this question. Let the gentleman from Maryland withdraw his proposition. Let the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his resolution, and let the gentleman from South Carolina withdraw the motion to lay the resolution, submitted by him, [Mr. WISE] on the table. Then let the CLERK go on and call the roll, calling the members from New Jersey, who had presented the legal formal certificates, according to the Constitution and the laws of New Jersey. Then we will be prepared to vote; and when we come to vote upon any question, if the votes of the New Jersey members will not change the result, nothing need be said about their voting; but if it does, then the tellers can report the fact to the House, and the House can then act upon the question. He thought this would be the most satisfactory mode of getting over all difficulty in relation to this question, and hoped gentlemen would cease pursuing shadows, and unite upon some practical proposition of this kind.

Mr. McKAY, after a few remarks, which, in consequence of the noise and disorder prevailing, with repeated calls to order, were not heard, said that he had before expressed the opinion, which he repeated, that neither party should be permitted to vote. The question has been submitted to the CHAIR, but the CHAIR refused to put it, until it should be decided by the House who should vote as members from the State of New Jersey. The House had already decided that the five New Jersey gentlemen who held the certificates of the Governor should not vote, and the CHAIR refuses now to put any question to the House, for the reason that it must first decide who are to vote as members from New Jersey, while there is no proposition to decide that point, either in an affirmative or negative before the House. This he considered to be a monstrous assumption of authority by the CHAIR. The House has decided that five of the claimants shall not vote, and a member then submits a motion that the other five also shall be prevented from voting until the controversy is decided. The CHAIRMAN then declares that, while he occupies that chair, he never would permit a sovereign State to be disfranchised, by prohibiting her Representatives from voting on any question before that House; and therefore he declares that he would not put the question. Did not the CHAIRMAN himself, at the last session, submit a resolution to the House, that no member whose seat was contested should be entitled to vote upon any question before the House, until his right to a seat should be first investigated and decided upon? Now if it was constitutional for the CHAIRMAN himself to present that resolution as a member of the House of Representatives, was it not constitutional for him, as a member of the House of Representatives, to offer a similar proposition? If, however, the House was willing to proceed at once to a vote, he would be willing to withdraw his proposition.

Mr. CRAIG asked if the House was now about to decide the right to seats of the members from New Jersey? He asked, in the language of the eloquent gentleman from Georgia, who addressed them the other day, how was the House to enforce its edicts? Under the difficulty they were involved in the other day, the CLERK deciding that he could not put a question, a Chairman was appointed, who would have the power to put questions. Now, what did the CHAIR tell this House just now? "As long as I occupy this chair, I will not suffer a sovereign State to be disfranchised by excluding the votes of her members on any question before the House." Sir, said Mr. C. we can never get along unless we attack difficulties one at a time. The first difficulty was that produced by the CHAIR itself in declaring that he would not put a question; his refusal to register the edicts of the House. The House had determined that the members who presented the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey shall not be permitted to vote. Let us, then, (said Mr. C.) dismiss all quibbles; let us feel and act as men, and consider this tantamount to a decision that neither party shall vote until the controversy is settled. [So much noise and confusion prevailed while Mr. CRAIG was speaking, that the Reporter heard him very imperfectly; and, in the concluding part of his remarks, his voice was completely drowned by the cries of "order, order!" "go on, go on!" &c.]

Mr. RHETT, in reply to some words from Mr. WISE, not heard, declined to withdraw his motion to lay that gentleman's resolution on the table. The question, he said, to decide the fate of that resolution, could as well be taken on the motion to lay it on the table as in any other way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland then said he refused to withdraw his motion; whereupon,

Mr. WISE moved the previous question on it.

Mr. RHETT then asked if that resolution of Mr. JOHNSON was before the House.

The CHAIR answered, that no question could be before the House, until it should decide who should vote as members from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. RHETT stated the question as he understood it. It first arose on his (Mr. R's) motion to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] on the table; next on the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, as a substitute; and then came the decision of the CHAIR, that no question could be put until the House decides who shall vote as members from New Jersey. Now he moved to lay the question raised by the CHAIR on the table.

Mr. WISE informed the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] that no motion could be put on that question until the preliminary one of who was entitled to vote should be first decided.

Mr. SLADE desired to know the question that was before the House.

The CHAIR said that the main question was for the meeting to determine who was entitled to vote from the State of New Jersey. The House having determined, by reversing the decision of the CHAIR, that the members, holding the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, should not vote, it was now necessary that the meeting should say who was entitled to vote, inasmuch as they would not deprive a sovereign State of its representation on this floor.

Mr. SLADE understood the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] had offered a proposition here, which he was disposed to keep before the House, unless the gentleman from South Carolina would withdraw his motion to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland said he would modify his resolution by withdrawing the second clause of it. The first clause contained a distinct proposition, and the House, by taking the question on it, would come to a direct vote on the principle involved.

Mr. SLADE then rose and made some remarks, which will be reported in full hereafter.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina rose to a question of order, several members trying to obtain the floor, and speaking at the same time.

The CHAIR again stated the question. The House must first decide who shall vote as members of New Jersey, and then the question on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina could be put. The CHAIR would, however, suggest a substitute for his decision, which he would adopt, if it met with the concurrence of the House. This was, the course of procedure he suggested on Saturday last, and which had been already adopted on taking two or three questions; that is, the CHAIR would put the question, and the tellers would, on counting the votes, report the result to the House; and whether any of the members whose seats were contested voted on the same, and should it be found any such voting would change the result, it would be for the House to determine whether such votes should be counted.

Mr. BLACK asked the CLERK to read the resolution, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, That the acting CLERK be directed to call the members of the House, including, in such call, the members from New Jersey, who have the certificates of the Governor of that State that they are elected as Representatives of the Twenty-sixth Congress.

Mr. SLADE rose and contended for his right to go on with his remarks.

The CHAIR said that the question was, who should vote from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. WISE. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to lay my proposition on the table; and therefore, the gentleman from Vermont was speaking out of order. We are come now, said Mr. W. to the direct question, and he beged gentlemen to let it be taken.

The CHAIR did not consider the gentleman from Vermont to be out of order. The reasons assigned by the CHAIR, for his decision, were not heard by the Reporter.

Mr. SLADE said, as so many gentlemen were anxious for him to yield the floor, he would do so to accommodate them.

Mr. RIVES rose, and attempted to address the CHAIR, to make some suggestions as to the mode of proceeding, when—

Mr. WISE, and several other gentlemen, called him to order. Great noise and confusion prevailed at the time, and repeated cries of go on, go on, were also heard.

Mr. RIVES again attempted to obtain the floor, when—

Mr. WISE again interrupted him with calls to order. Whether the question was on the motion submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina to lay his resolution, or the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, on the table, still the motion was not debatable, and he hoped the CHAIR would order the gentleman to take his seat.

The CHAIR was unwilling to arrest any gentleman on a point of order, who thought he had any new proposition to present to the meeting.

Mr. RIVES said it was not his intention to throw any obstacles in the way. He desired to come to some conclusion, and therefore he proposed to gentlemen to permit the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] to offer his resolution as an amendment to the resolution of his colleague, [Mr. WISE,] and let the House come to a decisive vote.

Mr. BRIGGS made a few remarks, showing the necessity of enforcing the point of order, and preserving decorum in the House.

Mr. PROFFIT endeavored to obtain the floor, and at the same time giving his opinion that the motion was debatable, and he wanted to have his share of it.

Mr. P. was called to order by several gentlemen, and he took his seat.

The CHAIR then put the question on Mr. RHETT's motion and directed the tellers to report the the names of those members voting whose seats were contested; and also to report how the vote would be without the votes of those gentlemen whose seats were contested, and how it would be with the votes of those gentlemen.

Mr. HOLLEMAN denied that such was the question before the House. He also denied that the question was ever presented for the House to decide, as stated by the CHAIR, as to who should vote as members from New Jersey, though the CHAIR wished to make it so. To constitute a question before the House there must be an affirmative and a negative, or how could the House decide it. How could it decide the question as to who should vote as members from New Jersey, when, having already decided that one set of the claimants should not vote, the CHAIR refuses to put the question as to the right of the others to vote! He denied that the CHAIR had a right to make any such decision. This was putting the House in a position in which it could neither advance nor recede. Some days ago, when the House was in a similar condition, in consequence of the CLERK deeming himself incompetent to put questions to the House, the gentleman occupying the Chair forcibly appealed to his fellow-members present to relieve themselves from the embarrassment in which the decision of the CLERK had placed them, by removing the CLERK and putting some one in his place. This appeal had been followed up by the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, which placed the gentleman himself in the Chair. It was then supposed that the House was relieved from the difficulties in which the decision of the CLERK placed them. But really, from the decision of the CHAIR just made, it appeared to him that it would become necessary for the House to remove him from the CHAIR, and put some one in his place who was willing to put a question. Mr. H. after a few remarks, made during much noise and confusion, appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and asked for the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. BRIGGS said if the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his objections, he would submit the proposition of the CHAIR to the House for its decision in the form of a motion. Mr. B. then submitted the following, which he read:

Resolved, That on the motion of Mr. RHETT to lay Mr. WISE's motion on the table, or on Mr. WISE's resolution itself, the tellers shall count all the persons who may pass between them; and if any pass whose right to vote is disputed, the tellers shall report their names to the CHAIR, after the number of votes on both sides are reported, for the decision of the House.

Mr. HOLLEMAN declined withdrawing his proposition, and insisted on taking an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

The CHAIR asked what decision the gentleman from Virginia demanded an appeal from.

Mr. HOLLEMAN said that his appeal was from the decision of the CHAIR, that no question could be put until the House decided who should vote as members from New Jersey.

The CHAIR said, I withdraw that decision. [Much laughter.]

The question was then taken on Mr. BRIGGS'S motion, and it was carried without a division.

The CHAIR then stated the question on Mr. RHETT's motion, and instructed the tellers, in counting, to report if any members, whose seats are contested, voted; using the language of the resolution just adopted on the motion of Mr. BRIGGS.

The House having seconded the call for the previous question,

The question was then taken, Shall the main question be now put? and was decided in the affirmative without a division.

The main question to lay Mr. WISE's resolution on the table was then put, Messrs. DROMGOOLE and DAVIES having been appointed tellers.

On counting the result, the tellers reported that there were 115 votes in the affirmative, and 114 in the negative; Mr. NAYLOR from Pennsylvania, whose seat was contested, voting with the nays.

The CHAIR announced this decision of the House to be 115 in the affirmative and 115 in the negative, (the CHAIR voting with the nays,) so that there being a tie, the motion was lost.

Mr. SMITH of Maine denied that the motion was lost, and appealed from the decision of the CHAIR. He understood the tellers as having reported that Mr. NAYLOR, whose seat was contested, voted with the nays. He denied the right of Mr. NAYLOR to vote, and objected to its being counted.

Mr. NAYLOR observed that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] had challenged his right to vote. Now, he challenged the right of the gentleman himself to vote. Here are my credentials, said Mr. N. holding them in his hand.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. I turn the gentleman over to Mr. INGERSOLL, who has the certificate of the judges of election, and the certificate of the Governor, under the broad seal of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WISE moved that the vote of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be counted, and on that motion, he called for the previous question.

Mr. REYNOLDS, amidst much noise and disorder, moved an adjournment—a number of gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. WISE and others opposed the adjournment, Mr. WISE proposing to sit by candle light.

The CHAIR was proceeding to put the question on Mr. WISE's resolution, which he said was the next in order; when

Mr. REYNOLDS insisted on his motion for adjournment, and demanded that the question be taken on it.

The CHAIR said that the motion to adjourn was not in order, while a question was pending.

Mr. SMITH and several members here contended that the question of Mr. RHETT's motion was not decided, and that it yet depended on the decision of Mr. NAYLOR's right to vote.

Mr. WELLER again moved the adjournment.

Mr. WISE restated his motion that Mr. NAYLOR's vote be counted, and also his motion for the previous question on it.

Mr. BRIGGS briefly explained the state of the question before the House. The question, he said, was put by the CHAIR, on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] on the table, and the tellers reported that the vote in the affirmative was 115, and in the negative, 114; but in conformity with the resolution adopted on his motion, they also reported that Mr. NAYLOR, one of the gentlemen whose seat was contested, voted with the nays. The CHAIR voting in the negative, there would have been a tie, and the resolution consequently lost, had there not been a vote cast by a gentleman whose seat was contested; but as there was such a vote given, the House must decide whether that vote should be counted, before the question could be considered as finally settled, whether the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia should be laid on the table or not. This, he believed, was a correct state of the case.

The CHAIR said he understood the decision of the House, in the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS,] to refer only to the contested seats from New Jersey, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] did not come within the decision of the House.

The question, therefore, the CHAIR considered to be on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BRIGGS said that his motion was general in its application, and applied to all the gentlemen whose seats were contested. At Mr. B's request the resolution was read by the CLERK, amidst much noise and confusion.

The CHAIR said that he had announced the decision of the House, that the resolution was lost, and did not hear the report of the tellers that a member whose seat was contested had voted.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose and stated that, as one of the tellers, he distinctly stated to the CHAIR, when he announced the vote, that Mr. NAYLOR, one of the gentlemen whose seat was contested, had voted. In this statement, Mr. D. was sustained by Mr. DAVIES, the other teller, by Mr. SMITH of Maine, and several other gentlemen.

The CHAIR said that the question before the House was the previous question on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TURNEY appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, as he considered that the first question to be decided was, whether Mr. NAYLOR's vote should be counted.

Mr. WELLER moved an adjournment, and the question was taken; Messrs. GRAVES and TURNEY were appointed tellers, and on counting the votes, they reported that there were—for the adjournment 116, against it 113; Messrs. KILLE, COOPER, and RYALL, members from New Jersey, whose seats are contested, voting in the affirmative, and Messrs. HALSTED, AYCRIGG, and YORKE, similarly situated, voting in the negative.

The CHAIR then stated that the votes of the members whose seats were disputed not varying the result, it was decided in the affirmative, and that

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1839.

Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. MOUTON appeared in their seats this morning.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate all the information which the War Office contains, or can conveniently procure, of the massacres of individuals, of families, of small parties, and of shipwrecked crews or passengers, which have taken place in Florida during the present hostilities, and including those which took place before the war became open on the part of the Indians; noting, as far as it can be conveniently done, how far families have been broken up, and driven from their homes, their houses burnt, and their fields and property destroyed.

Mr. BENTON also offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate as follows:

1. A table of the import and export of gold bullion, with the excess of each, annually, from the commencement of the Federal Government, or as far back as the returns in the Treasury Department will enable the table to be made up.
2. A like table of gold coin.
3. A like table of silver bullion.
4. A like table of silver coin.
5. A table of recapitulation showing the total annual imports and exports of coin and bullion in one column, and the excesses in two other columns, for the same length of time.
6. A detailed statement of the weekly exportations of coin and bullion for the year 1839, showing the names and residences of the exporters, and their consignees in foreign countries.
7. A detailed table of exports and imports of coin and bullion of the United States for the year 1839.
8. A table of the annual coinage of gold and silver at the Mint of the United States and the Branch Mints, from the time they were respectively established.
9. A table of the annual product of the gold mines of the United States from the time of their discovery.

The whole of said tables made up to the end of the year 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States; which was laid on the table.

The Senate then went into Executive session; and afterwards

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1839.

As soon as the journal of yesterday was read,

Mr. WISE rose and moved an amendment to the journal, to insert after the paragraph which declared that Mr. SMITH of Maine contested Mr. NAYLOR's right to vote, "and Mr. NAYLOR also contested Mr. SMITH's right to vote."

Mr. SMITH said he had no objection to this amendment in the journal.

The question was then put, and the amendment of the journal agreed to.

The CHAIR then stated the question to be on the appeal of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TURNEY] from the decision of the CHAIR. The CHAIR had decided that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] to lay Mr. WISE's resolution on the table, was lost—the vote standing 115 in the affirmative and 115 in the negative, counting the votes of the CHAIR and Mr. NAYLOR in the negative. From this decision the gentleman from Tennessee had taken an appeal to the House.

Mr. WISE then called the previous question on this appeal, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The main question then, was, whether the decision of the CHAIR, as stated above, should stand as the judgment of the House.

Messrs. JOHNSON and CARTER, both of Tennessee, were appointed tellers; and when the yeas were counted, the tellers announced that there were 112 voting in the affirmative, counting the votes of Mr. NAYLOR, and the five New Jersey members, who claimed seats under the Governor's certificate.

The other side was then counted, and the tellers announced that there were 118 voting in the negative, counting the vote of Mr. INGERSOLL, and three of the New Jersey members claiming seats as having been elected by the people.

The CHAIR then stated, without announcing the result, that there were six members voting in the affirmative whose right to vote was contested, and four voting in the negative whose rights were also contested; and as the names of these persons had been given in to the CLERK, it would be for the House to decide upon their right to vote, name by name, as they had been presented to the CLERK.

Mr. SMITH. It don't change the result, therefore let the CHAIR announce the decision of the House.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON. There are more members from New Jersey and Pennsylvania voting than those States are entitled to have on this floor by the Constitution and laws of the United States. Therefore the question must be decided as to who have a right to vote.

The CHAIR again stated that there were more members voting from New Jersey and Pennsylvania than could be permitted to vote under the Constitution and laws, and it would now be for the House to determine who of them should vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maine inquired how many votes were given on the question in the affirmative and negative, including all who voted.

The CHAIR stated that there were 112 voting to sustain the decision of the CHAIR, and 118 against that decision.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. There are 112 in the affirmative, including 6 whose rights were disputed, and 118 in the negative, inculding 4 whose rights were disputed. Then the decision of the CHAIR is reversed, whether you do or do not count the disputed votes; and what good can result from raising this question as to the right of these disputed members to vote now. Besides, he had understood it to be the express understanding that no such question should be raised, when the votes of the disputed members did not change the result.

Mr. WISE said that the rule prescribed by the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] was the rule of action for the meeting, and that resolution did not confine us to the point suggested by the gentleman from Maine. But it declares expressly that, where disputed members have voted, that part shall be reported to the House, and the House will then have to decide upon their right to vote, whether their votes change the result or not.

The CHAIR then decided that the meeting must now proceed to determine upon the rights of the disputed members to vote, name by name, as they had been given in to the CLERK.

Mr. WISE. Then I call for the reading of the name of the first contested member who voted in the affirmative, and on the question as to his right to vote. I move the previous question.

[Half a dozen of members now rose to address the CHAIR amidst loud cries of "order," "order," "order."]

Mr. TURNEY rose, amidst loud cries of "order! order! order!" and said that a vote had been taken in the House, which should be announced by the CHAIR, before any other question was raised. Sir, said Mr. T. I ask if you were placed in that chair to announce only such decisions as would suit your party? [Much noise and confusion, with cries of "order! order!" "go on! go on!" "hear him! hear him!"] Sir, you must dispose of the question before the House, and announce the decision it has made, before you attempt to raise another question. I want to know if you were placed in that chair to suppress the decisions of this House, and play the tyrant? [Much noise and confusion.]

[Mr. STANLEY here ran across the area in front of the CLERK's table, and up one of the passages, slapping his hands, and crying out in a loud voice, "Let the gentleman come to me; I will settle that question with him."]

Mr. TURNEY. Sir, your decisions have been again and again reversed by the House, because you have had no regard to law, to justice, and to the rules and usages of the House; and although the House has so reversed them, its decisions cannot be enforced, because you are determined to make good your declaration, that so long as you occupy that Chair, the members from New Jersey whose cause you favor, shall never be deprived of their votes. The House has reversed your decision but a short time ago, on my appeal, by a clear majority of undisputed members. There were voting against your decision 118, only four disputed members voting on that side, while there were only 112 voting to sustain that decision, six of whom were disputed members. So that by striking out the four disputed votes against your decision, there would be a majority against you, even though you count the disputed votes in favor of your decision. Yet, notwithstanding this clear majority, you refuse to announce the result, and decide that another question must first be determined. Sir, your decision is tyrannical and monstrous. You have usurped the powers of the House, and attempted to reverse its solemn decisions, and I shall appeal again and again, so long as you pursue this most extraordinary course. I demand that you shall announce the result on the vote taken this morning, and if you decide that you will not, I appeal from your decision.

[Great disorder was now prevailing in the House.]

Mr. INGERSOLL rose to say a single word—

["No," "no," "no," "hear him," "hear him."]

Mr. VANDERPOEL appealed to the courtesy of the gentleman, to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say a word.

["No," "no," "no," "He shall not speak," emanated from various parts of the House.]

Mr. SMITH of Maine, would appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] to say if it was not his intention, by his resolution, that no notice should be taken of the disputed votes where they did not change the result.

Mr. THOMPSON then rose, and asked the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the motion for the previous question.

Mr. WISE said he could not do so for the dearest friend he had. The sooner we settle this question, the better for us and the country.

The CHAIR then stated the decision which he had made this morning, that the House must determine who of the disputed members had a right to vote on the appeal taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, and stated also, that the gentleman from Tennessee had taken an appeal from this decision.

Mr. WISE. Then I move the previous question on this appeal.

Mr. TURNEY said, in order to disembarrass the House, he would withdraw the appeal he had taken a few minutes ago.

Mr. WISE. Then I move the previous question on the question as to the right of the first disputed member to vote.

The CHAIR put this question to the House, and declared that the previous question was seconded.

Mr. McKAY rose to a question of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] had offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That on the motion of Mr. RHETT to lay Mr. WISE's motion on the table, or on Mr. WISE's resolution itself, the tellers shall count all the persons who may pass between them; and if any pass whose right to vote is disputed, the tellers shall report their names to the CHAIR, after the number of votes on both sides are reported, for the decision of the House.

Now this resolution provided for but two cases, in which the tellers were to report to the House.

Mr. WISE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. McKAY. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered this resolution.

Mr. WISE. I call the gentleman to order. The previous question has been moved and seconded by the House, and no gentleman can now discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. McKAY. I can certainly raise a question of order.

The CHAIR stated that the main question must now be presented to the House, and, that being put, the main question was ordered.

Mr. WISE called for the reading of the first name in the affirmative.

[Here there was a difference between the CHAIR and the CLERK as to whose name should be called first. The CLERK pointing to the name of Mr. NAYLOR as being first on the list, and the CHAIR pointing to the names of the Whig members from New Jersey.]

Mr. WISE. The name, the name. Let us have the name.

The CLERK then read the name of Mr. NAYLOR as being first on his list.

Mr. CRABB here asked for the reading of the credentials in his case. He would not vote in the dark upon any question, to carry out the wishes of any party.

Mr. McKAY now rose, and stated his point of order. By the resolution which he had read a few minutes ago, the House had confined itself to two cases in which the tellers were to report the names of the contested members voting—first upon Mr. RHETT's motion to lay Mr. WISE's resolution on the table, and secondly on Mr. WISE's resolution itself. He would appeal to the gentleman who offered the resolution to say if this was not the case.

Mr. WISE. I call the gentleman to ordsr.

Mr. McKAY. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts,

Mr. WISE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose amidst considerable noise and confusion, and stated that this question which the CHAIR was about to propound to the House, had already been decided. The CHAIR had decided that the members claiming seats from New Jersey, under the Governor's certificate, were entitled to vote, and the House had reversed that decision. Therefore the House had decided that they should not vote, and why was it attempted again and again to force this question upon the House, which had already been decided.

Mr. GRANGER. I call my orderly friend and colleague to order. By the 45th rule of the House, no debate can arise upon a question of order, after the previous question has been sustained.

The question was now stated to be on the right of Mr. NAYLOR to vote.

Mr. CRABB again stated that before that question was put, he desired to have the credentials of both Mr. NAYLOR and Mr. INGERSOLL read, in order that he might vote understandingly on the question.

The CLERK then read the proclamation of Governor Ritner, dated the 30th of October, 1838, which declared that Messrs. PAYNTER, SERGEANT, TOLAND, NAYLOR, etc. were elected members of the Twenty-sixth Congress.

Mr. CURTIS. How many members of Congress does this proclamation include?

Mr. WISE. All from the State of Pennsylvania—twenty-eight members.

Mr. KEIM inquired whether the great seal of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania had been affixed to this proclamation in the first instance.

The CLERK held up the proclamation, but the reporter could not see whether the great seal was upon it or not.

Mr. KEIM. Is there not some memorandum in the possession of the CLERK, which will show that the great seal was not upon it in the first instance?

The CLERK then read a read a memorandum, as the Reporter understood it, that Mr. JOHN SERGEANT had called at the CLERK's office and obtained the proclamation, for the purpose of having the seal of the Commonwealth placed upon it, which had been omitted in the first instance.

Mr. NAYLOR then rose, and said, I hold in my hand a proclamation of Governor Porter, dated nine days before the issuing of the proclamation declaring Mr. INGERSOLL elected, which declares that I am elected.

[Many voices. Let us hear it read.]

The CLERK then read the paper which Mr. NAYLOR handed up. It was a copy of the proclamation of Governor Ritner, before read, which had been obtained from the office of the Secretary of State, at Harrisburg, and certified by Francis R. Shunk, Secretary of State, as being a correct copy, and also containing a certificate of Governor Porter, that Francis R. Shunk was his Secretary of State.

Mr. RAMSEY. This is a mere copy of the proclamation of Governor Ritner, which was read a short time ago.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. Did I not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] to say, when he presented this paper, that he held in his hand a proclamation of Gov. Porter, dated a few days before the issuing of the proclamation declaring Mr. INGERSOLL elected, which declared that he (Mr. NAYLOR) was elected?

[Loud cries of "order!" "order!" "order!"]

Mr. NAYLOR. Leave the gentleman to me. I will answer him.

Mr. SMITH proceeded. Did the gentleman not make the declaration that he held in his hand a proclamation of Governor Porter, declaring him elected? I should be the last man to charge the gentleman with intentional quibbling, but if that was his declaration, and the paper read was the one referred to, I put it to the House to say whether he has not been quibbling? Will the gentleman answer me?

Mr. NAYLOR rose.

The CHAIR called to order.

Mr. NAYLOR. I appeal to the House and to the CHAIR to do me an act of justice.

The CHAIR decided that no debate could be permitted now.

Mr. WISE then called for the reading of the law of Pennsylvania in regard to the elections of members of Congress from that State.

Mr. RIVES. I understood that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRABB] had called for the reading of the credentials of the contested member from Pennsylvania. I now inquire, has every thing connected with the returns of members from that State, whose seats are contested, been read?

Mr. COOPER. As a Representative of the State of Georgia, I protest against that course.

Mr. RAMSEY. As a Representative of the State of Pennsylvania, I insist upon it.

Mr. CRABB said he had called for the credentials in this case—all of them—but he wished to hear nothing in regard to any other question than the question as to who had the returns according to the laws of Pennsylvania.

The CLERK then read the law of Pennsylvania of 1832 in relation to the election of members of Congress After which,

The CHAIR said it would now be for the House to decide whether Mr. NAYLOR's vote should be counted.

Mr. DUNCAN then called for the reading of the thirty-fourth rule of the House; which was read as follows:

"No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately or particularly interested."

Mr. F. THOMAS and Mr. FILLMORE were then appointed tellers, and the vote was announced—119 to 112, the disputed members from New Jersey voting, but their votes could not change the result. So the House decided that Mr. NAYLOR's vote should be counted.

Mr. WISE. Now read the next man in the affirmative.

The CLERK then read the name of Mr. AYCRIGG.

Mr. WISE. I move the previous question in his case, and call for the reading of his credentials.

Mr. TURNEY. Is it the intention to read the credentials on one side only?

Mr. WISE. No; read all—we will hear all.

The CLERK then read the credentials in the case of Mr. AYCRIGG?

The credentials of Mr. AYCRIGG being read,

The certificate of Mr. Westcott, Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey, certifying that Messrs. RYALL, COOPER, DICKERSON, VROOM, and KILLE, received a majority of the votes, was also read; after which,

Mr. WISE called for the reading of the laws of New Jersey regulating the elections in that State, and

Mr. BYNUM called for the reading of the second and fifth sections of the Constitution, providing "that each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualification of its own members;" all of which were read.

The CHAIR being about to put the question,

Mr. BYNUM raised a question of order. He wanted to know if the House had not already solemnly decided that the votes of the members whose seats were contested should not be counted. He thought, therefore, that this question could not be taken a second time.

Tellers were then called for, and Messrs. COOPER of Georgia and PARMENTER were appointed.

Mr. AYCRIGG announced to the House that he would not vote in his own case.

The question was then taken whether the vote of Mr. AYCRIGG should be counted, on which the tellers reported—ayes 117—Messrs. MAXWELL, YORKE, HALSTED, and STRATTON, whose seats were contested, voting with the ayes; and the noes to be 122—three members from New Jersey, Messrs. KILLE, COOPER, and RYALL, whose seats were contested, voting in the negative.

The CHAIR then announced the decision of the House to be 117 ayes, which, with the vote of the CHAIR, made 118 in the affirmative, and 122 votes in the negative.

The CHAIR considered this decision of the House to be utterly unconstitutional.

[Roars of laughter, and much noise and confusion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE considered the declaration made by the CHAIR, that the decision just given was unconstitutional, to be a direct reflection on the House.

The CHAIR proceeded. Four of those who voted in the affirmative are members from the State of New Jersey, whose seats were contested, and three of those who voted in the negative were gentlemen who contested their seats. The decision of the House deprived a sovereign State of its right to say through its constituted authorities who should be its Representative on that floor; and it was, therefore, in the opinion of the CHAIR, unconstitutional; but, inasmuch as the meeting, in its present imperfect state, had thought proper to make the decision, the CHAIR would acquiesce in it, and announce the result; which was, that the vote of Mr. AYCRIGG should not be counted. [Much laughter and continued confusion.]

Mr. SMITH of Maine then asked who was next?

The CHAIR replied, Mr. MAXWELL.

Mr. WISE moved the previous question, and that it be taken orally.

[Cries of "No, no! tellers!"]

The House having seconded the previous question, Messrs. PARMENTER and COOPER of Georgia were appointed tellers, and the question was taken whether the vote of Mr. MAXWELL should be counted, on which the tellers reported 116 ayes, Messrs. HALSTED, YORKE, and STRATTON, voting in the affirmative; and 122 noes, no gentlemen whose seats are disputed voting in the negative.

The CHAIR then announced the decision of the House that the vote of Mr. MAXWELL should not be counted.

Mr. WISE proposed, with the general consent of the House, to take the question as to counting the votes of the other three gentlemen, Messrs. HALSTED, YORKE and STRATTON, together.

This having been agreed to, the question was taken, and the same tellers as on the last vote reported that there were 110 in the affirmative and 117 in the negative, no contested members voting on either side.

The CHAIR then announced the decision of the House that the votes of Messrs. HALSTED, YORKE and STRATTON should not be counted.

Mr. WISE next called for the question whether the vote of Mr. INGERSOLL should be counted, and this question was decided in the negative—ayes none, nays 133.

The next question taken was whether the votes of Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, RYALL, COOPER, and KILLE should be counted, and this was decided in the negative—113 nays, ayes none; when

The CHAIR announced that the votes of these gentlemen should not be counted, and went on to say that the appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, that the vote of Mr. NAYLOR should be counted, made by the gentleman from Tennessee, had been decided against the CHAIR; but, in the process of that decision, the House had decided that that very vote should be counted, and thus, in effect, affirmed the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. WISE then said that the decision just made by the House brought back the question to his resolution, for it had decided that the vote of Mr. NAYLOR should be counted, and this vote made a tie on the motion to lay his resolution on the table. He therefore called for the previous question on it.

The CHAIR then stated that the question before the House was the previous question on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PICKENS said if that was the question before the House, he held in his hand an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and therefore he would vote against the previous question.

The question was then taken by tellers, Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON and PECK, to ascertain if there was a second to the previous question; and they reporting 113 ayes, and 113 noes, the CHAIR voted in the affirmative, and, therefore, announced that the call for the previous question was seconded.

The question was then stated by the CHAIR to be, "whether the main question shall now be put."

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for tellers; and amid loud cries of "no, no—no tellers,"

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would withdraw the call for tellers if the House would permit the amendment of the gentleman from South Crrolina to be read.

Cries of "no, no! tellers, tellers!"

The same tellers were then appointed—Messrs. CAVE JOHSON and PECK; who, after counting, reported 117 ayes, and 97 noes; so it was decided that the main question should be put.

The main question was then stated by the CHAIR to be on Mr. WISE's resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Acting Clerk of this House shall proceed with the call of the members from the different States of the Union in the usual way, calling the names of such members from New Jersey as hold the regular and legal commissions from the Executive of that State.

The ayes and noes having been called for on different sides of the House,

Mr. WISE said, let us have the ayes and noes. We have purged the House, and there is now no objection.

The CHAIR said that by the general consent of the House, the ayes and noes might be called.

Which being agreed to, the question was taken in that way, and was decided in the negative—yeas 115, nays 118, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon W. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Black, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, J. Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Colquitt, J. Cooper, M. A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, E. Davies, G. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggins, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, Hunter, James, Jenifer, C. Johnston, W. C. Johnson, King, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mercer, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, C. nolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, E. Rogers, J. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, A. Smith, J. Smith, Thos. Smith, Starkweather, Steinrod, Strong, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, F. Thomas, P. F. Thomas, J. Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, D. D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, H. Williams, and Worthington 118.

Mr. RHETT then submitted the following resolution, and moved the previous question on it:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested; and after the names of such members are called, and before a Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the election returns and qualifications of all claimants (Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. NAYLOR excepted) to the seats contested on this floor.

The resolution having been read, the second to the previous question was decided in the affirmative without a division.

The next question, Shall the main question be now put? was taken, and also decided in the affirmative without a division.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia then moved a division of the resolution into two branches, and to take the question on each separately; the first branch to end with the word contested.

This having been agreed to,

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked if the effect of it was to preclude an investigation, by the House, into the returns and qualifications of its own members.

Mr. PICKENS. By no means, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With that understanding, sir, I shall vote for it.

The CHAIR then stated the question to be on the first branch of Mr. RHETT's resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested.

On taking this question it was decided in the affirmative without a division.

The question next came up on the second branch of Mr. RHETT's resolution, in the following words:

"And after the names of such members are called, and before a Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the election, returns and qualifications of all claimants (Messrs. INGERSOLL and NAYLOR excepted) to the seats contested on this floor."

Mr. MERCER called for the yeas and nays on this question; which were ordered, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 138, nays 92, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, H. J. Anderson, S. H. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, A. G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. J. Wagner, Warren, E. D. White, John White, T. W. Williams, L. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, S. Williams, and Wise—92.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, who voted with the majority, then moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken, and observed that his purpose was, if his motion prevailed, to submit the following resolution, which he read to the House:

Resolved, That the Acting Clerk of this House shall proceed with the call of the members from the different States of this Union, calling the names of such members only as present the legal evidence of their being members elect of the Twenty-sixth Congress; and that this House will proceed to its organization in the usual form, with the understanding, that as soon as the rights to the contested seats are determined, its first organization shall be dissolved, and a new election for officers be held forthwith.

Several members asked if the motion for a reconsideration was in order.

The CHAIR decided that it was.

Mr. PICKENS. Then if the reconsideration is ordered, I shall move this resolution [holding up one in his hand.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose, and begged the attention of the House while he explained the object he had in view. It had been a matter of surprise to him, that the resolution submitted some days ago by an honorable member from New York [Mr. HUNT] had not met with a more favorable consideration by the House. That proposition was, that the names of all the members who held certificates of their election from the constituted authorities of their respective States, should be called by the CLERK, and that then if a quorum should be presented, they should proceed to the organization of the House, by electing the Speaker and other officers, with the understanding that if, after an investigation by the House into the returns and qualifications of the members whose seats were contested, it should be found that such organization of the House had been effected by a minority, in consequence of the votes of members not entitled to seats, that then the House should set aside these elections, and proceed to a new organization. This proposition he had endeavored to follow up, in the resolution he now wished to offer. Notwithstanding, (said Mr. C) the difficult and helpless position we are now placed in, we have now an opportunity of setting a precedent, which may be the foundation of parliamentary law in future times. He did not regret the difficulties and embarrassments which the House had to encounter. He rejoiced that this question had been raised in this early period of our history, a period of peace and tranquillity, rather than in one in which, if the people were less intelligent, more corrupt, and less attached to our institutions, a military leader might march his myrmidons into that hall, and settle it according to his own pleasure. We are still in that helpless condition. The wheels of the Government are stopped, while the House is unable to advance a step towards the desirable object of organization. But what are we to do? Unless we subject ourselves to the delay of going into the merits of the elections, as contemplated by the resolution of his colleague just adopted, during all which time the more important legislative business of the House must be neglected, we have only one possible course to adopt, and that is to call the names only of such members as have the legal and regular credentials from the constituted authorities of their respectives States, and with them, having formed a quorum, proceed to the organization of the House, by the election of its officers, with the understanding that he had before adverted to. No possible harm could result from this course; for after the House shall have decided on the returns and qualifications of the gentlemen whose seats are contested, the organization may be dissolved and a new election of officers gone into, if it should be found that such elections were made in consequence of members voting who had not been duly elected. Notwithstanding all we have seen in the newspapers of the day; notwithstanding all the documents that had been read at the CLERK's table, we have heard nothing (Mr. C. said) to warrant us in deciding that the rights of the people of New Jersey have been outraged, and that the five gentlemen who come here with the certificates of the Governor of that State have obtained these certificates through fraud. Until it shall be proved that her constituted authorities have been recreant to the obligations of honor and of duty, and have abused the high trusts confided to them, we cannot, (said Mr. C.) without better evidence, dispute the validity of their certificates. I am satisfied (said Mr. C.) that gentlemen of all parties in the House are governed by the most liberal as well as patriotic considerations; and that they would not allow any party feelings to influence them in a decision involving the rights of five-sixths of the representation of a sovereign State. But I, said he, who have never been behind the scenes, who am bound to neither party, venture to say that, if the two parties were not so equally balanced that the election of a Speaker depended, in a great measure, on the decision as to which set of the claimants to seats from New Jersey should be admitted as members from that State, the difficult and embarrassing questions now before us never would have been raised.

And now, with the same spirit, but not with the same eloquence, with which the proposition of the gentleman from New York was made, I invite gentlemen, of all parties, to join in this compromise. We cannot shut our eyes to the injustice of excluding five-sixths of the representation of a sovereign State; and, further, we cannot shut our eyes to the injustice of allowing a minority to elect the officers of this House, in consequence of the votes of those who hold false certificates. There is only one equal ground on which both parties could meet on this question; and that is, by temporary organization, to last only until the election returns and qualifications of disputed members are decided on. The House could then go into a new organization, if it should be necessary. In our present situation, (said Mr. C.) it is the best and only course we could adopt. If we adhere to the resolution just decided, it may be months before we can settle the controversy in regard to the election cases; our legislative proceedings may be impeded for months, and the interest of our constituents be sacrificed. It must be conceded that this was a moment of peculiar interest to the commercial community. Standing, as we do, on the brink of a great commercial crisis, our fellow citizens are looking with great anxiety for the message of the President, which they expect will convey to them important and useful information. In addition to this, our fellow-citizens of Florida are looking with great anxiety for the assistance of the National Government. Since we have been sitting here, intelligence has reached us that four of our fellow-citizens have been murdered within a few miles of St. Augustine, and their bodies were carried into the town, presenting a horrid spectacle of savage barbarity. The circumstances should not only stimulate us to our duty, but appeal to our humanity. Such are the events now occurring on our Southern border, and at the adjournment of the last Congress, dark and portentous clouds were gathering on our Northeastern frontier. Those clouds, it is true, for the present, were happily dissipated. But let us be organized. Let us ascertain our position. The clouds again may gather, and the good ship upon which we are embarked should be put in trim, that if the storm should burst, we may be prepared to meet it manfully.

One remark he would make in reference to himself, before he sat down. He stood here unpledged to any party; but when he added that when he went for a strict construction, it was not necessary for him to say that he would favor a Democratic orgainzation on the part of this House. He never would, however, neither for party, or any other purposes, adopt a course which he thought in opposition to the State Rights principles he professed. It was with these considerations that he submitted his motion for a reconsideration, which he hoped would meet with the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. GRAVES thought that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina was, in substance the same as that of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] for it was stated by several gentleman that they did not question the right of the majority to alter the organization of the House, after deciding on the contested election cases. The majority, Mr. G. said, could alter the organization of the House as well after adopting the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, as after adopting that just submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina. Mr. G. saw that there would be no end to discussion, without adopting the course we have pursued all the morning; and, therefore, he would call for the previous question on the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was lost without a division.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON observed that he would vote for the reconsideration, without pledging himself to vote for or against the resolution of his colleague.

The CHAIR having stated the question,

Mr. TURNEY called for a division of the question on the reconsideration, so as to take the votes in the same order that they were taken on adopting Mr. RHETT's resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL observed, that his motion was worded to suit the whole resolution, and could not, without destroying its effects, be divided.

The CHAIR said that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina was not susceptible of a division.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS took the liberty of suggesting to the CHAIR that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] was divided into two parts, and the question taken on each separately. It was not, therefore, in order to take the question on reconsidering these two propositions in one vote.

Mr. WISE said the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina was indivisible. The gentleman from South Carolina intended it to be so, and he certainly ought to know how the question ought to be taken.

Mr. BRIGGS insisted that the motion was divisible. The resolution, he said, was divided into two distinct propositions; the question was taken on each separately, and therefore, the question on the reconsideration must be taken in the same way.

Mr. TURNEY appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. HUNT moved that the House adjourn; and

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on the adjournment.

Several members objecting,

Mr. LEWIS suggested that, in the present condition of the House, the yeas and nays could not be called without the consent of all present.

The CHAIR decided that they could not.

Tellers being called for on the adjournment, Messrs. HABERSHAM and GALBRAITH were appointed, who, on counting, reported 90 for it, and 104 against it.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. TURNEY reiterated his appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, that the motion could not be divided.

The CHAIR said he was of opinion, at first, that the motion was not susceptible of a division, but upon a reconsideration the CHAIR conceived that a division would become necessary. The resolution, he added, having been passed in two parts, the question on reconsideration must also be taken in two parts, and taken in the same order in which the questions on the resolution itself were taken. The CHAIR then stated the question to be on reconsidering the first branch of Mr. RHETT's resolution.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. GRAVES and LEWIS having been appointed tellers,) and decided in the negative—ayes 102, noes 116.

So the House refused to reconsider the first branch of Mr. RHETT's resolution.

Mr. PETRIKIN here moved that the House adjourn.

The CHAIR decided that the motion for adjournment was out of order, because a question was pending.

Mr. ATHERTON. If the CHAIR decides that motion to be out of order, I appeal from his decision.

Mr. VANDERPOEL also appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. DROMGOODE. With the permission of the CHAIR, I will only make one observation. If the CHAIR adheres to his decision, he may keep us here all night without adjourning. Two propositions have been made, and the House has decided one of them. The CHAIR then declares we cannot go away without deciding the other.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the previous question on the appeal.

The CHAIR. I withdraw my decision, and will, if the House please, take the question on the adjournment.

Tellers being called for on the question of adjournment, Messrs. HABERSHAM and GALBRAITH were appointed as such, and upon a count, it was ascertained that there were—ayes 107, noes 54.

The House then adjourned till to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, M.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, Dec. 12, 1839.

A message from the President of the United States was received, which being of an Executive character,

The Senate went into an Executive session, and, afterwards,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, December 12, 1839.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of S. C. to reconsider the vote on the second branch of Mr. RHETT's resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL rose and stated that as the House had on yesterday refused to reconsider the first branch of Mr. RHETT's resolution, he would now withdraw the motion to reconsider the second branch of the resolution.

The CHAIR announced that the gentleman from South Carolina had withdrawn his motion to reconsider.

Mr. WISE. Then I presume the resolution which the House has passed will be put in operation, and that the CLERK will proceed under it to call the roll of the House.

The CLERK then commenced at Pennsylvania, where he had left off on the first day of the session, and called the balance of the roll entirely through, as follows:

Immediately after the roll was called—

Mr. RANDOLPH of New Jersey rose and said: the list of members having been called, I hold in my hand a paper, which I ask to be read by the CLERK.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. I should like to know what that paper is. I object to the reading of papers until we know what they are.

Mr. RANDOLPH. When it is read the gentleman will see what it is.

Mr. BYNUM. I object to its being read, because I do not believe the rules of the House will sanction it.

Mr. WISE. It will be read merely for information.

The CHAIR said that the paper would be read.

Mr. DROMGOOLE here endeavored to obtain the floor.

Mr. PICKENS hoped the gentleman from New Jersey would make a brief statement of the contents of the paper, so that the House may know what it is.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If the CLERK will hand me back the paper I will read it myself. That will be the best way to give gentlemen the information they desire.

Mr. SMITH of Maine rose to a question of order. Objection had been made to the reading of the paper, and it would now be for the House to determine whether it should be read or not.

The CHAIR said the gentleman refused to make a brief statement.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose to proceed with the reading of the paper.

Mr. SMITH said he did not know what the paper was which the gentleman held in his hand; but if it was prepared with a view of showing that himself or other gentlemen were entitled to seats here, he hoped the CLERK would also be permitted to read the paper which he had prepared on the same subject.

Mr. WISE. Certainly gentlemen do not forget that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was permitted to read, and have read, papers, as a part of his speech, and why do they object to the reading of this paper, merely as a matter of information?

[Many voices—"Go on," "go on."]

Mr. RANDOLPH then read a lengthy paper, signed by Messrs. AYCRIGG, HALSTED, MAXWELL, STRATTON, and YORKE, protesting against the action of the House, by which they were excluded from voting on questions previous to an examination of their case, and concluded by moving that the protest be entered on the journal of the House.

Mr. BYNUM said he protested against the entering of this protest on the journal of the House; and he though the House owed it to its own dignity to pass a vote of censure upon the gentleman from New Jersey, for offering this direct insult to the members of this body. It was contrary to all the rules and usages of the House for persons to come here and offer objectionable and insulting language to the House, who have no connection with it. They do not belong to this House, and have no more right to enter a protest on the journal of this House, than inhabitants of Great Britain. What, sir, is the character of that paper? It is nothing but the ebullitions of disappointed ambition, coming from men who have been excluded from this House, and prevented from practising an imposition on the free people of the State of New Jersey. A protest, indeed! Why, sir, members of this House alone have the right to have a protest entered upon your journal; and the signers of this protest, as they call it, are not members of the body. Then, instead of receiving or countenancing this paper, which has been read by the gentleman, he deserves the censure of the House, if not expulsion from the floor. [Laughter.] The gentleman cannot be looked upon as a member of the House; and if the House was properly organized, he would deserve the censure of the body for the course he has pursued. The gentleman was conscious, when he first presented this paper, that it contained objectionable matter, and hence it was that he endeavored to shrink from responsibility, by declining to make a brief statement of its contents, and sending it up to the CLERK's table to be read. He hoped that the paper would be returned to the member from New Jersey, as the attempt to have it entered on the journal was entirely out of order. The member had no right to make the motion, and the CHAIR had no right to entertain it. If he understood the course of proceeding last night, the CHAIR had decided that no motion was in order but a motion to adjourn. Now, however, it was perfectly in order for a member to get up and present a petition, called a protest, of men, aliens as it were in this House, who had no right on this floor, and who had been voted again and again out of this House. He hoped that this protest, as it was called, would receive no countenance from this House. Contrast the conduct of these men, who have attempted to present this paper, with the conduct of the Democratic members, who have been excluded. The Democratic members who have been excluded, act the part of gentlemen, and men of honor, disposed to yield to the solemn decisions of the House, when they are once made. Their conduct is a commentary upon the conduct of their opponents, and ought to be so considered, and will be so considered, by the freemen of the State of New Jersey. There has been no disposition, on the part of the Democratic members who have been excluded, to thrust themselves into the House. They have exhibited a disposition to yield to the decisions of the majority of the House, as they know they were sent here by a majority of the people. The members on the other side who have been excluded, are endeavoring to thrust themselves into the House, notwithstanding they have been voted out again and again. [Laughter.] Gentlemen may laugh, but they cannot laugh truth into falsehood.

Mr. DROMGOOLE here attempted to obtain the floor.

Mr. MERCER. I rise to move the previous question, and on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIR. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DROOMGOOLE. My point of order is this: that the gentleman from New Jersey, had no right to spread this protest on the journal, and that the CHAIRMAN had no right to receive it, after its reception had been objected to, and spread it before the House, until the House had first decided, by a vote of the House that it should be received.

The CHAIR considered that the paper had been received when first presented.

Mr. DROOMGOOLE said he did not desire to do any thing unfair. When the House should, at the proper time, proceed to the decision of the New Jersey case, no man would be more ready to afford to both parties a full and fair hearing.

Mr. WISE would ask his colleague, whether, after the withdrawal of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, any gentleman had not a right to make any motion pertaining to a settlement of thisquestion.

The CHAIR said a point of order was made, as to whether the CHAIRMAN had a right to propound to the House the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, before the House had received the paper presented by the gentleman. The CHAIR considered that the paper was received and read by consent of the House; and after it was read, the gentleman moved that it be entered on the journal.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. It will be recollected that I stated expressly that I objected to its being received and read.

Mr. WISE would say a word with regard to the reception of this paper. The gentleman might have arisen and said, "I move to present a paper, and have it recorded"—that is a presentation, and having presented it in this way, he had a right to have it read. The CHAIR, therefore, could not prevent its being read, and he was bound, by the law of order, to receive it.

The previous question was then seconded—ayes 107, noes 87, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on th main question, which were ordered.

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose to a question of order. [Loud cries of "order! order!"] My question of order is this: Whether, by calling the yeas and nays, we do not, from necessity, spread this paper on the journal?

Mr. WISE. Certainly, sir.

The question was then taken on the mo ion to enter the protest on the journal, and decided in the negative—yeas 114, nays 117, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Doberty, Dennis, Dillet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Wise—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, De la Montanya, Doane, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Helleman, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steinrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—117.

So the House determined that the protest should not be entered upon the journal.

The CHAIR then stated that the first part of the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, which had been adopted by the House, had been carried into effect. It would now be for the House to carry into effect the second part of the resolution, which was in the following words: "and after the names of such members are called, and before a Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the election, returns, and qualifications of all claimants (Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. NAYLOR excepted) to the seats contested on this floor.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose, and submitted the following proposition, with a view of carrying into effect the latter part of the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of nine, be appointed viva voce, by the members of this House, to whom shall be referred all the papers in the possession of the CLERK relating to contests for seats on this floor from the State of New Jersey, and that they report thereon.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it seemed to him that the House must feel itself bound in good faith to carry into effect the latter part of the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, and it had occurred to him that the most practicable way to do so would be to appoint a committee to examine into the matter. The question will then arise before the commiitee as to whether it is bound to take the returns sent in by the Governor of New Jersey as prima facie evidence, or whether it will examine into the facts of the case, and ascertain whether those facts would justify the making out of such a return as the Governor of New Jersey had sent in here. Mr. D. desired to make no argument on the question, and therefore concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. WISE rose to a question of order. He wished to know whether it was competent for his colleague, after the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina had been adopted - which declared that the House should hear and adjudge upon all claims, &c.—to take from this body the adjudication of the question.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose to a point of order.

Mr. WISE. I am speaking to a point of order; and I contend that when the House has decided that it will hear and adjudge upon all claims to seats, that it is not in order to pass another resolution, taking the adjudication of the question from the House, and giving it to a committee.

Mr. DROMGOOLE stated that when the matter was examined by the committee, it would come back to the House; and besides, the House had control of all its committees.

The CHAIR stated that he was of opinion that it was perfectly competent for the House to proceed in the manner indicated by the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia. He therefore decided that the resolution was in order.

Mr. PROFFIT rose to ask an explanation. [Loud cries of "order!"] If gentlemen think I will yield, they are mistaken. [Great confusion, and cries of "order! order!"] I am about to raise a point of order, and I will speak as long as other gentlemen have spoken. [Continued cries of "order!"] I have rights to maintain—I am personally responsible, here or elsewhere—["order!" order!"] and if the CHAIR decides that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia is in order, I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman was not in order.

Mr. PROFFIT. Then I appeal from that decision, and I shall speak upon it. [Many voices—the appeal is not debatable.]

Mr. PROFFIT. It is very well for some of you that it is not, [universal laughter]

Mr. WISE asked the gentleman to withdraw his appeal.

Mr. PROFFIT then withdrew his appeal.

Mr. BELL rose, and called for the reading of the latter part of Mr. RHETT'S resolution, which being read by the CLERK, Mr. B. submitted to the CHAIR, whether the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was in conformity with the resolution which had just been read. He asked if there was to be any limitation as to the proofs to be submitted to this committee; and if there was, it was a resolution of the existing order of the body, and consequently was not in order.

Mr. CRAIG. That will be a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. BELL made no objection to the resolution, provided it conformed to the existing order of the House; but if it did not do so, he took it that it was not in order.

Mr. THOMAS rose to make a single remark.

Mr. PROFFIT. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. THOMAS wished to say but a word on the point of order.

Mr. PROFFIT called the gentleman to order.

The CHAIR did not consider the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia as limiting the order of the House of yesterday. The proposition of the gentleman from Virginia was to raise a committee, to whom all the papers in the case should be referred; but it will be perfectly competent for the House, after the committee is raised, to refer other papers to it, because the House always has it in its power to control its committees.

Mr. WISE. Do I understand my colleague as admitting this construction. I wisk him to speak, for I know my colleague of old.

Mr. DROMGOOLE hoped his colleague would not make him appear so very old here, [looking towards the ladies' gallery.] With regard to the inquiry, he would simply remark that the view taken of his resolution, by the CHAIR, coincided with his views when he presented the resolution. He never dreamed but that the House had the power to send to the committee any testimony it saw proper to refer to it.

Mr. SLADE would ask the gentleman to modify his resolution, so as to make it conform to the resolution of yesterday.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was then ordered.

The yeas and nays were called upon the main question, and were—yeas 122, nays 84.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Wise—84.

So the resolution was adopted.

[When the name of Mr. BERNARD was called, he rose and said that he declined answering to his name, because he considered that the House had no constitutional power to adopt such a proceeding.]

[Mr. COOPER of Georgia declined voting on the same grounds.]

Mr. WISE. I presume that the question now before the House is, whether we shall proceed to ballot for a committee. I give notice, therefore, that I will not ballot, and I recommend to my friends to refuse to do so.

[Cries of agreed, agreed.]

Mr. SMITH of Maine. I give notice to the House that I will ballot.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, rose and said that he held in his hand a resolution, which he intended to present, and on which he should not move the previous question, to prevent any absurdity that it might contain from being exposed, as other gentlemen had done in the case of the resolutions presented by them. The House had resolved that it would consider these elections when he was persuaded that they had no power to move one step in the matter. The members from New Jersey who held the Governor's certificates, have presented the prima facie evidence of their right to the seats they claimed. The members who contest their seats present evidence to show that they have received a majority of the votes given; and it is contended that theirs is the best prima facie evidence, unless it can be shown that that majority was made up of the votes of aliens, as contended for on the other side. Mr. T. then went on to show that it would be impossible to do justice to either party, without hearing all the evidence that might be deemed necessary by both parties; and that the House had no power, in its present state, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses. He knew not how the House was to act, but he had seen enough to know that the strongest principle in the nature of man was party feeling; and under the influence of that feeling, he had seen the sacred principles of the Constitution trampled down. He deemed it highly necessary that the committee should act under the responsibilities of an oath; but as no oath could be administered, but in an informal manner, he had drawn up a resolution for that purpose, which he now submitted to the House. Mr. T. here read his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee raised on the New Jersey election, have power to send for persons and papers, and to swear witnesses; and that the members of said committee be themselves sworn before entering upon their duties.

Mr. PICKENS having obtained the floor, said, I move this resolution as an amendment to that offered by my colleague. I desire, before proceeding into a discussion of the question, to state very briefly the position which I occupy upon it. If the House chooses, in its wisdom, to raise a select committee in this case, I desire that the action of that committee shall be confined to some distinct question, and to the distinct question raised by this House. I desire their action to be confined to the simple question, "who are returned as members from the State of New Jersey?" I agree in the justice of many of the remarks of my colleague in relation to the position now occupied by the House. I understood this from the first, and therefore I voted against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and yesterday voted against the resolution of my colleague, for I foresaw the very difficulties in which we are now involved; and I take the occasion to say, that I voted against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia for another reason, and that was, I desired a different mode of proceeding than the one contemplated by it. If I had been called upon to vote upon the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the first day of our meeting, I would have voted in the affirmative. I thought that those members from New Jersey who held the certificates of the Governor of their State were entitled to take their seats, and to hold them until it should be shown that the contesting claimants had a better title. I desired that course of proceeding in order to give efficiency to our organization; but the House thought proper to take a different course. I thought it due to the country, to our own dignity, and to a sovereign State of this Union, that the certificates of her constituted authorities should be received as prima facie evidence; and I regret that a triumphant party, flushed with its recent victories in different sections of the Union, should have taken a different course. They have thought proper to take a course different from the one I approved of, and we are now involved in difficulties very little creditable to an American Congress. It is true that the House has already thought proper to bring forward, in an informal manner, certain testimony connected with the case; but it is a question, whether that is not competent testimony under the Constitution; and I contend that this House has a right to decide the question on the first day of the session, if they thought proper. I will read that clause of the Constitution, under which this House has the power to act on this subject.

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

It will be perceived that the Constitution, in this clause, makes three distinct subjects on which this House is entitled to decide. I contend that they are, in their very nature, distinct questions. It may decide that a member is returned, and that he is, under the Constitution, totally disqualified. Suppose you judge of the returns of a member who is under twenty-five years of age, or an alien: he may have a majority, and not be entitled, under the Constitution, to take his seat. So we may decide that a member is entitled to the returns, because he has a majority of the polls, and yet not be legally elected, because that majority was made up of persons who had no right to vote. In the progress of this case, we have seen one notorious fact is admitted. It is admitted by the papers, and admitted by the gentlemen from New Jersey themselves, that a majority of the votes of the people of New Jersey were given to other members than those claiming their seats under the certificates of the Governor. That fact was admitted by them, with one qualification; and that was, that that majority was made up of illegal votes. This admission, therefore, is giving up the whole question. Who decided that they were not legal votes? Was it the Governor? the clerk? Sir, I lay down this broad proposition, and challenge a reply: that there is no officer or State authority whatever, who can decide upon the legality of votes, after they are once deposited in the ballot boxes. You may challenge votes at the polls, as is done in the State of Virginia; but the proposition I contend for is this—

Mr. WISE here asked permission to make an explanation.

Mr. PICKENS, in continuation. I will yield the floor for an explanation, but I protest against the practice of many gentlemen, for the last two years, of taking the advantage of being allowed to make an explanation, and then making an argument instead of it.

Mr. WISE said there was a law of the State of Virginia appointing a commission to purge the polls—not at the time and place of the elections, but within a given number of days thereafter.

Mr. PICKENS continued. I admit the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. I admit that the State of Virginia has taken upon herself to purge the votes after they have been received into the ballot boxes. I ask if that is the naked proposition? and if so, I am prepared to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of it.

Mr. WISE made a brief explanation, which, from the noise prevailing, the Reporter did not hear. It related principally to the manner of voting in Virginia, which is viva voce.

Mr. PICKENS resumed. The proposition I maintain is, that, under that clause of the Constitution I have just quoted, we are created, in the very terms of the Constitution, the sole and exclusive judges of the returns; and if any State authority interferes to purge the polls, after the votes have been deposited in the ballot boxes, or after they have been given, viva voce, if you please, as in the State of Virginia, (unless he does it for the purpose of ascertaining whether the votes have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature,)—unlesshe does it to carry out that provision of the Constitution, it it is a monstrous violation of the rights of this House. Here let me observe, in reflecting upon this clause, that it strikingly displays the wisdom of those who framed this instrument. Suppose a contrary result, and that the Constitution gave to the State authorities the power of judging of the returns of the Representatives? This House would be at the mercy of this or that conflicting party in every State. It was essential to the preservation of its purity and independence, that it should possess the power given to it by the Constitution, of judging of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. You cannot get over the plain and palpable provisions of the Constitution. I do not understand that the question has been raised by any gentleman here, that the State authorities of New Jersey have the right to purge the polls after the elections are over. It being admitted that they have not that right, I contend that we have the right to judge of the returns of the members from New Jersey; that we can do it now; and that, in doing so, we are not bound to go into other particulars touching the elections until we are better prepared to do so. I do not mean to cast any censures on the Governor for having given his certificates to persons who did not receive a majority at the polls. He may have supposed that he was doing his duty, and may have looked upon himself as a mere ministerial register of the votes returned by the clerks of the counties. Sir, he may give his certificates to one set of gentlemen, and other gentlemen may be entitled to the returns; and the proposition I mean to demonstrate on this floor is, that there is no authority in New Jersey competent to enter into and decide upon the legality of votes after they have been deposited in the ballot boxes. This House, and this House only, can decide upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. Without that provision in the Constitution, where is our independence? But some gentlemen suppose that we are not constitutionally organized, and that, therefore, we can do nothing. Allow me, sir, to say that there is some confusion on this subject. The Constitution says that "the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year; and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall, by law, appoint a different day." What is Congress? Analyze it. The members are elected from the different States, and assemble here every year as the Constitution directs. Gentlemen suppose that we must take the oath before we can decide upon the matter now before us; but is this the fact? I will refer to that point of the Constitution which which prescribes the oath to be taken. It is in these words: "The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution." Does the Constitution prescribe the time when we shall take this oath? Does it say that we shall take it on the first day or the last day of the session? The law of '89 directs that after a Speaker is elected, a member of the House shall administer the oath to him, and that he shall then administer it to the rest of the members. But, sir, I contend that when we assemble on the first day of December, we are a body, competent to decide on the elections, returns, and qualifications of our own members, and that we can do so before taking the oath. Sir, I think it would be inexpedient, though we have the right to do so, to enter at this time into he elections and qualifications of these New Jersey members; but on the other question—that of the returns—we are not only competent to enter into it, but it is highly expedient that we should do so. Suppose it be declared that Mr. A and Mr. B should be the judges, and exclusive judges, of the returns of these New Jersey members. Would there be any difficulty in it? The whole difficulty arises from there being 242 judges, instead of one judge.

In offering this proposition, I have acted solely in consequence of the dictates of my own judgment, and with a view to obviate the difficulties in which the House is involved. I believe that the gentlemen who have produced certificates are not entitled to the returns, and I am prepared to meet that question. I thought we were competent to decide it on the first day of the session, and think it would have been better if we had decided it on that day, fearlessly, boldly, and frankly, instead of being delayed and mystified by special pleading. I have acted under the dictates of my own judgment, and have not been influenced by party drill or the dictates of a caucus.

[Mr. P. after portraying in forcible language the evils flowing from party spirit, said, that for many years past there had been too strong an Executive action in this Government, and that it was time for the Representatives of the people to spurn at Executive dictation, and assert their own independence. It was time, he said, that they should redeem the House from a base subserviency to that monster god, party, and to look with a single eye to the welfare of the country.]

I have introduced the resolution, Mr. P. continued, to meet the case before the House. I maintain that we are, by the Constitution, the exclusive judges of the returns of our own members, and that there is no concurrent jurisdiction in any State, Governor, or Legislature; and, in maintaining these principles, I maintain the principles that are essential to the preservation of American liberty. The propositions I lay down are, 1. That this House is the sole and exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; 2. That no State officers have the right to take into consideration the legality of the votes after they have been deposited in the ballot boxes; and, 3. That those who have the majority of the votes have a right to the returns. Upon these principles I voted against Mr. INGERSOLL's right to vote. The majority of the votes were given to his opponent, Mr. NAYLOR; and, though it was contended that this majority was the result of fraud, I voted against Mr. INGERSOLL because I believed that the judges had no right to throw out the votes, because they deemed them fraudulent—that in so doing, they were usurping the powers of this House. When the question, however, comes up to be finally decided between the two gentlemen, I will meet it, and decide according to the evidence before me; but I protest against the right of the officers of the State of Pennsylvania to judge of the legality of votes, after they have been deposited in the ballot boxes. I know, said Mr. P. the delicacy of the position I occupy. I know that the course I have adopted may be misunderstood, and perhaps censured; but I would not wear the proudest jewel on a monarch's brow, if I could not wear it unshackled. There is no sentiment I ever proclaimed in the closet, that I would not proclaim to the world. I am prepared to meet this question frankly, boldly, fearlessly; and I am willing to go into it now.

Mr. P. here read the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to be raised on the New Jersey elections, be confined to the question who is entitled to the "returns" of elections for the Twenty-sixth Congress.

Mr. CRAIG rose to a point of order. The House had decided that it would proceed to the election of a committee, and he would submit to the CHAIR whether it was in order for gentlemen to offer other propositions. Let us (said Mr. C.) go into the election of the committee, and afterwards let the gentlemen from South Carolina make their propositions. I subscribe (said Mr. C.) heartily to all the gentleman's doctrines, and go for the whole of them.

Mr. HOLMES of S. C. then addressed the House in a very able and lucid argument in support of Mr. PICKENS's resolution; and Mr. RHETT followed in a powerful address in opposition to it.

[From the lateness of the hour we are unable to give sketches of these gentlemen's remarks, but they will be given in full shortly.]

After Mr. RHETT concluded his remarks,

Mr. LEWIS gave notice that he would move a reconsideration of the vote on Mr. RHETT's resolution, provided Mr. PICKENS's resolution should be lost.

Mr. CRABB then gave notice that he would move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the appointment of a committee, in case a reconsideration should be ordered of Mr. RHETT's resolution.

On motion of Mr. WISE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, December 12, 1839.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN HENDERSON, elected by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi a Senator from that State, to serve for six years from the 4th of March last.

The usual oath was administered to Mr. HENDERSON, and he took his seat.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. LINN, lays over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to send to the Senate all the information in his possession relating to the southern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, Dec. 13, 1839.

The journal of yesterday having been read,

Mr. WISE rose to propose an amendment to the journal. The journal stated that the gentleman from New Jersey moved that a paper, purporting to be a protest of gentlemen claiming seats from New Jersey, be entered upon the journal. He contended, that as the yeas and nays were taken on the motion to enter the protest on the journal, the protest must of consequence go on the journal. The gentleman from New Jersey had moved that the following paper (the protest) be entered on the journal, and when the question was taken on that by yeas and nays, it was a settled rule of the House that the paper referred to must go on the journal.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that the House had rejected the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey on yesterday, to enter the protest on the journal; and, consequently, it was not put on the journal of yesterday. If no objection had been made to spreading the protest on the journal in the first instance, he took it for granted that the calling of the yeas and nays would have placed it on the journal; but objection having been made, and the House having adjudicated on the matter, the CLERK was not authorized to disregard the solemn decision of the House, when the House itself had said that the paper should not go on the journal. Suppose this protest had been disrespectful and insulting to the House, would gentlemen say that we were compelled to enter it on the journal, because a single member of the House had moved that it should be placed upon the journal?

Mr. CHINN desired to know of some of the old members whether it was customary, in such cases as this, to enter papers on the journal.

Mr. DROUMGOOLE would show some precedent on this subject. Previously to doing so, however, he would premise that the journal of the House had been made out, and in accordance with the rule of the House, submitted to the presiding officer of the body for his inspection and revision, before it was read this morning. He therefore presumed that it had passed the ordeal of the inspection of the CHAIRMAN, and had been approved by him. Then, in support of that opinion of the CHAIR, for the CHAIR had certainly approved of the journal, he begged leave to read a few precedents. Mr. D. then referred to the journals of the House, where Mr. Garnet had proposed to enter a proposition on the journal in relation to the South American Republics, and a question was taken upon it, yet the proposition had not been entered upon the journal. He also referred to a case where Gen. Glascock and two other gentlemen moved to spread their views on the journal, with regard to Mr. Pinckney's resolutions on the subject of Abolition petitions, and a question was taken, yet their views were not spread on the journal.

Great stress had been put by his colleague on the call of the yeas and nays, he having contended that that call compelled the House to enter the protest on the journal; but he would ask gentlemen whether the call of the yeas and nays either added to or diminished the power of the House. The protest was no part of the proceedings of the House, and he would ask whether the mere call of the yeas and nays would compel the House to spread it upon the journal.

Mr. WISE. If my colleague will give way, I will state my object.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I believe I know the object of my colleague. I will not, however, say of him, as he said of me yesterday, that I know him of old—for we are both young men—[laughter]—but I believe his object to be to get on the journal of to-day, indirectly, what the gentleman from New Jersey could not get on the journal of yesterday directly. I think I see the drift of my colleague; but I shall endeavor to show that it would involve the House in absurdity to adopt the course contended for by my colleague. I will not read the proceedings in the case which I am about to refer to, because they are familiar to every gentleman here. It will be recollected by gentlemen that the President of the United States, a few years ago, sent to the Senate a protest against certain action of the Senate, and asked that it be entered on their journal. He was not a member of the Senate; neither were the persons who presented this paper here members of this House. So far there was a similarity in the two cases. Well, after the protest of the President was read in the Senate of the United States, that body refused to receive it, and refused to enter it upon their journal, and no legislative device of the friends of the President could get it on the journal. After that protest was read in the Senate, various motions were made, with a view of getting it on the journal, and the yeas and nays called; yet the Senate never would permit it to go on the journal on their motion, because they did not wish to involve themselves in the absurdity of putting on the journal that which they decided should not go upon it. The House decided on yesterday that this protest should not go on the journal; and will they permit now, to go upon it in the shape of an amendment of the journal, that which they decided should not go upon it yesterday. If the House intended to act consistently, there was no other means of placing this protest upon the journal, but by moving to reconsider the vote of yesterday.

Mr. WISE then submitted a resolution that the following paper be entered on the journal of yesterday, to wit:

We, the undersigned, Representatives of the State of New Jersey, duly commissioned as such in conformity with the laws of the said State, having been in part excluded from our privileges in this meeting of the members of the House of Representatives, deem it our duty to place before this body and the country our views with respect to the rights of our State and of ourselves, and the powers and duties of this meeting. We therefore affirm, in the presence of the members of the House of Representatives here assembled and of the whole American people, the truth of the following propositions:

1. That, by the Constitution of the United States each State has the power to prescribe by law the time, place, and manner of holding elections for its own Representatives in Congress; which power includes the right of prescribing the time, place, and manner of ascertaining and making known the result to Congress and the world.

2. That the determination of the State authorities, authenticated in the manner prescribed by the State laws, is the only evidence of the election of members of the House of Representatives which can be received prior to the organization of the House; and is final and conclusive until reversed by the House itself, duly organized.

3. That no one who cannot produce the evidence of his election, prescribed by the laws of his State, is entitled to take a seat in the House of Representatives; and no one who does produce such evidence can be excluded before an investigation by the House, without a gross violation of the Constitution of the United States and the rights of the States themselves.

4. That the House of Representatives cannot be constitutionally organized nor a quorum formed until all the States of the Union have had an opportunity to appear by all their Representatives; and that a constitutional quorum is not merely a majority of the Representatives elect after the arbitrary exclusion of other members, on any pretext whatever, but a majority of all the members from all the States, after each State has had an opportunity to appear by her Representatives, and to constitute a part of that quorum.

5. That the body here assembled, having no judicial powers, possessing no means of sending for persons and papers, not legally authorized to examine witnesses under oath, and expressly forbidden by law to go into the consideration of any business before the House is organized, and the oath to support the Constitution administered to its members, cannot exercise the higest judicial function belonging to the House of Representatives—that of receiving and reversing the decisions of the State authorities in relation to their own elections; and that its only power is to require the paradoc appearing here as members to produce the credentials prescribed by the laws of their respective States.

6. That the State of New Jersey having by law prescribed the time, place, and manner of holding elections, and also the time, place, and manner of making known the result, and having for this purpose selected the highest kind of evidence known to the Constitution, to the common law, to the Parliamentary law, and to the laws of nations—a commission under her great seal and signed by the Executive—has thus made known to Congress and to the world that we are her Representatives in the 26th Congress:

This body having, in defogation of the principles above affirmed, refused in part to recognise our credentials, and that upon the authority of a paper which, emanating from an officer not recognised by the laws of New Jersey regulating elections, and therefore not under the sanction of an official oath, stating merely inferences from other papers, themselves not evidence, being ex parte affidavits, taken without authority of law, and without notice to us, and proved by the law itself to be false upon its face, could not be received as proof of the facts it asserts in any court of record in the Union; and an intention being manifested to carry further this result to our State, and to consummate the outrage upon her rights, by excluding us, her Representatives, from taking part in the organization of the House, we, in the name of our State, and of ourselves, and in behalf of our common country, and of all the other States whose rights are outraged in the violation of ours, do most solemnly protest against any such usurpation of power by this body, and do utterly disclaim its right to do an act which will be a bolder and more flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States, and of the laws and rights of the States themselves, than has ever yet been attempted in this country.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12, A. D. 1839.

JNO. B AYCRIGG,
CHARLES C. STRATTON,
J. P. B MAXWELL,
J. HALSTED,
T. JONES YORKE.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose to a point of order.

Mr. WISE thought his colleague's point would turn out to be a "point no point."

Mr. DROMGOOLE submitted a point of order. Under the rule, the judgment of the House is to stand until it is reversed, and can only be reversed by a motion to reconsider; therefore, could his course reverse the decision of the House, without reconsidering the vote of yesterday?

Mr. WISE then referred to decisions under the late Speaker of the House, to show that papers had been entered upon the journal in cases where the yeas and nays had been called, and where the House decided that they should not go on the journal. Mr. W. stated that this rule of proceeding had been admitted by the gentleman from New York on yesterday, and he contended that it was the only protection of minorities to adhere strictly to rules. Mr. W. referred to a variety of precedents in the course of his remarks, and concluded by moving the previous question on his resolution.

Mr. DAVIS moved to lay the motion of the gentleman from Virginia on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired of the CHAIR if the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia would not go on the journal of to-day, whether his motion prevailed or not?

The CHAIR stated that the journal of yesterday had been made up as usual in such cases, omitting the protest; but as a motion had been made to-day embracing that paper, according to the decisions of the two last Speakers of the House, that paper would go on the journals of to-day.

Mr. DROMGOOLE appealed from this decision, so that it might be seen whether the House would sustain this course of proceeding.

Mr. TILLINGHAST then referred to a rule of the House, which had been adopted since the cases referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] by which, he contended, a paper must be entered on the journal, when submitted in the shape of a motion by a member of the House, and the yeas and nays were ordered upon it.

Mr. TURNEY would inquire whether the House was now about to adopt a rule by which a member might spread upon the journals any paper coming from individuals out of the House. If you adopt this rule of action, you put it in the power of any one member of the House to incorporate in a motion every Abolition petition which may come to this House, and you will be compelled to enter them at large upon your journals, notwithstanding you may have adopted a resolution declaring that they shall not be read and received by the House. He hoped gentlemen would reflect on this matter before they adopted such a precedent as this.

Mr. HOFFMAN contended that every proposition should be entered upon the journals, upon which members were called to vote by yeas and nays, in order that their constituents might be correctly informed in relation to their votes.

Mr. PETRIKIN rose, and moved the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. HOFFMAN here raised a question as to whether the appeal was in order. The gentleman had only made an inquiry of the CHAIR, and, upon the answer to that inquiry being given, he had appealed without the CHAIR having made any formal decision.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said that the motion of his colleague was not a motion to amend the journal of yesterday, but it was simply a motion to do that indirectly to-day which the House refused to do directly yesterday.

Mr. WISE. I stated that I made a motion to amend the journal in this way—by incorporating the protest in my resolution. Get that off the journal if you can.

Mr. DAVIS of Ia. inquired whether his motion to lay on the table would not lay the whole question on the table. If so, he moved to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. MERCER wished to know if a motion to lay the journal on the table would not prevent us from keeping a journal.

The CHAIR said certainly not; for when this question is disposed of, any other motion may be made with regard to the journal.

Mr. BYNUM. Can a member of the House do that indirectly which another member has been prohibited from doing directly?

The CHAIR. The gentleman must answer that question himself. [Laughter]

Mr. SERGEANT rose to a question of order, and was stating it at considerable length, and referring to the proceedings of the House, when

Mr. BYNUM called him to order, because he was going on to debate the question in the very face of the rule.

Mr. SERGEANT then asked if the motion to lay on the table was in order.

The CHAIR. The gentleman has withdrawn that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir, I have repeated it two or three times.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked whether, if the motion to lay on the table prevailed, the journal of yesterday would be laid on the table.

The CHAIR replied that it would not, but that all the questions which had been raised this morning would.

Mr. TURNEY inquired if the motion to lay on the table took precedence of the appeal taken by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIR said the motion to lay on the table took precedence.

Mr. WISE said the gentleman's motion embraced all the appeal—the amendment of the journal and all.

Mr. MERCER here raised a question of order as follows: "A motion being made to amend the journal of the House, while the journal was passing before the House for correction, the CHAIRMAN decided that should the motion to amend be laid on the table, the journal does not accompany."

Mr. M. appealed from this decision, and called for the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them, and the decision of the CHAIR was sustained almost unanimously.

The yeas and nays were then called on Mr. DAVIS's motion to lay on the table, and were—yeas 103, nays 119.

So the House refused to lay the question on the table.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I presume now my question on the appeal comes up.

Mr. WISE asked if, by the votes already taken, his resolution was not placed on the journal.

Mr. PETRIKIN renewed the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then submitted a point of order, that the journal could not be altered under pretence of amendment.

Mr. WISE objected to his colleague's point of order, that it stated what was not true. He objected to any one putting words into his mouth by color, by paint, or by whitewash.

Mr. SMITH of Maine thought it was very singular if they could not keep off their journal any figures, characters, or words, they had expressed a determination should not be placed on it.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the CHAIRMAN whether he would put the question on a motion offered by him or not. He had called for the previous question three or four times, and the CHAIRMAN, with an obstinacy peculiar to himself, refused to put the question to the House. He wished to know, on behalf of himself and his constituents, how long this course was to be persisted in.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then said that, if his proposition was not similar to the one heretofore adopted, he would withdraw the former, and now offer it in the following words:

"Mr. WISE of Virginia moved to amend the journal, by inserting thereon a paper presented on yesterday by Mr. RANDOLPH, which the House refused to enter on the journal. Mr. DROMGOOLE made a point of order, that it is not in order, under color of amending the journal, to propose to insert said paper, the decision for yesterday being still in force."

Mr. PETRIKIN. And on that I call the previous question. The CHAIRMAN will now understand me, I hope.

The CHAIRMAN decided that Mr. DROMGOOLE's proposition was not in order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. From that decision I appeal.

Mr. PETRIKIN. And on that appeal I demand the previous question; which was seconded.

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the ayes and noes, which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to lay the whole subject on the table, which was carried in the affirmative.

So the whole subject of amending the journals, and incidental questions, were laid on the table.

The CHAIR stated that there were two privileged questions. The first was the motion of the member from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] to reconsider the resolution of the member from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT]

Mr. LEWIS said that it was not his intention to press his motion at this time, but gave notice that if the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] was defeated, he would call it up.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the next proposition was that of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRABB] to reconsider the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE]

Mr. CRABB said, he did not call up his motion to reconsider the resolution of the honorable member from Virginia who sits behind him, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] because he considered that, under one of the rules of this House, it comes up of course after the disposition just made of the prior motion of his honorable colleague, [Mr. LEWIS.] He desired that such should be the course, for he was anxious that his motion should now be considered and acted on by the House.

Mr. C. considered it due to himself, before the question was taken, to submit a few remarks in explanation of his course. He was not in the habit of troubling the House in this way, preferring, as he did, to content himself with the explanation which his votes would give upon all questions of interest. But such had been the fact, that, prior to the call of the roll, many votes had been taken by tellers merely, which course left no traces of his opinions as expressed by the votes he thus gave. Without an explanation, therefore, his later votes, which appeared upon the journal, would misrepresent his true sentiments, and, so far as his first votes were known to members, present an inconsistency.

He therefore embraced this occasion to say that his mind had undergone no change on the question. He came here with the opinion which he still entertained, that the claimants from New Jersey, having credentials in conformity with the laws of that State, just as he came with the commission of the Governor of Alabama, pursuant to the law of that State, were, equally with himself, entitled, temporarily, to take their seats on this floor, and participate in the organization of the House. This was his opinion when he entered this hall, and this opinion remained unchanged.

But the House rejected the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] declaring his (Mr. C's) opinions on this plain proposition, thereby showing, as he then conceived, a majority of the body adverse to his own well founded view of the correct course to be pursued. What, then, was to be done, and yet to avoid that course upon this floor, which might well be denominated factious? Why, surely, to adopt the next best proposition. He discovered, he thought, that proposition in the one offered by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] which pledged the House, before it would go into an election of Speaker, to inquire into and determine who are entitled to seats on this floor as Representatives from New Jersey. This, under the circumstances, was the next best course that could be pursued, and therefore he supported it. He supported the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] merely as a convenient and expedient mode of carrying out the resolution offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] and adopted by the House

But what have we now heard, said Mr. C. on this floor? Instead of an adherence to the principles which he considered as settled by a majority of the House in rejecting the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] yesterday submitted views which he (Mr. C.) could not consider otherwise than inconsistent with the previous course of that honorable gentleman. He said this in a proper spirit, and not with a view of censuring in the least the course of the gentleman, but merely the better to account for and explain his (Mr. C's) own course. He yielded with great pleasure to that gentleman, and every other, the same privilege he claimed for himself, of pursuing his own course, in his own way, uninfluenced by the dictation of any other person or body of persons. But that gentleman formed one of the small majority which had, on a former day of the session, rejected by his vote the correctness of his (Mr. C's) views, and now expressed opinions, which, if followed out, could but lead to a different course. What then became his (Mr. C's) duty? Certainly to retrace his steps, taken correctly under the circumstances as they appeared at the time, but which he now had reason to hope, and believed, with the aid of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] the House would be induced to retrace, and thereby place us once more upon the true ground, where the House could do at once, and while it was yet in time, what had been his original opinion, and which had undergone no change from the arguments he had heard: that is to say, proceed to organize the House, permitting the people of New Jersey to be represented, for the time, by those who come here under the authority of her laws, and through the instrumentality of her Governor, who, in the language of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] is the only organ of communication upon this subject, between that State and this House. He deemed, with that gentleman, the Governor of that State to be the only legal organ; the only voice hat the House could properly recognise in this stage of the proceeding; but if a majority of the House should persist, as he had understood them heretofore to decide, he should on this, as on all similar occasions, bow with respect to the will of the majority.

Mr. C. said he had a word to say in relation to the resolution which his honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] proposed to offer. He agreed with him that the direct and proper question for decision by the House at this time, was the question of return, and not the question of election. The Constitution separates these questions, and they must be decided as they arise before the House. That gentleman admits that the question now before the House, is the question of return; but, says he, not who are returned, but who ought to have been returned. He considered that his friend, by his resolution, varied the direct question as contained in the Constitution itself. That instrument gives this House the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of gentleman presenting themselves here as claimants to seats on this floor. The first question that necessarily arises at the commencement of each Congress, is, who are returned? After this, if any contest is instituted, the question arises as to the election or qualification, as the case may be, of the member returned. Now the resolution of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] proposes that this House shall inquire into who ought to have been returned from New Jersey; not who is returned. If this be the proper question on the subject of returns, push the reasoning another step, to the election; and the question, by parity of logic, would be, not who is elected, but who ought to have been elected. Do not gentlemen see the effect of such reasoning, and that it will lead them into an absurd construction of the powers of this House on this subject? And do they not perceive that the question of who ought to have been returned, is precisely coextensive and identical with the question of who is elected? He would say, also, that his views on this question did not commit him in the least on the merits of the question of election. Whenever that question came legitimately before the House, after it shall be organized, the members sworn, &c. he should go into that question without prejudice, and prepared, he hoped, to decide it on correct and constitutional principles.

He had said this much under an imperious sense of duty to himself, and that his friends here and elsewhere might understand the impulses under which he had acted. He generally preferred silence to a mingling in the general debates of the House, because he was averse to the unnecessary consumption of precious time by the almost interminable debates which are witnessed on this floor. He had troubled the House on this occassion for another purpose: to declare, what he conceived to be the duty of every true Republican, his disposition to submit, with profound respect, to the clearly expressed will of a majority, on all occasions where the Constitution does not guaranty rights to a minority. Any other course he deemed factious and highly improper; in which respect he was not, and never would, he hoped, become a party man. Party, as regards principles, was right and proper in itself. There was not a more sublime spectacle than high sacrificing devotion to principle; but party ties, and party devotion, for self-aggrandizement, and mere party purposes, call it what you will, was but mere faction at last, and greatly disreputable to any body of individuals

He hoped his motion to reconsider would prevail; that his honorable colleague's [Mr. LEWIS] would also prevail, and that the House would retrace its steps to what he conceived, with due deference for all who differ from him, to be the constitutional and only correct view of the subject.

Mr. WISE obtained the floor, and said that if he could be assured by gentlemen on both sides that they would reconsider the vote for the appointment of a committee, and come directly to the vote on the returns, upon the evidence now before the House, he would yield the floor. If gentlemen on all sides would say now, that they would reconsider the vote appointing this committee, and at once take up a resolution to determine the question whether either one set or the other of the New Jersey members should take their seats, he would be silent, and beg gentlemen also on all sides to be silent. [Cries of agreed, agreed, on all sides.]

Mr. W. then recapitulated the terms of his proposition, and there was a general assent to it on all sides, with the exception of

Mr. TURNEY, who said, I for one will not agree to this proposition.

Mr. WISE resumed. Gentlemen have now had a fair proposition made them, and they have rejected it. Let us now hear no more about the responsibility of keeping this House from organization, and from proceeding to the public business. A gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. TURNEY,] one of the accredited leaders of the Administration party, objects to the fair proposition I have made, and it falls to the ground. [Much noise and confusion, and loud cries of "Mr. TURNEY withdraws his objections," while others were heard crying "go on, go on."]

Mr. TURNEY here rose and said that he withdrew his objection at the solicitation of his friends.

Mr. WISE. There is so much confusion that I am in doubt what to do; several gentlemen around me call upon me to go on with the debate, while others tell me that they will accede to my proposition. The gentleman from Tennessee objecting—

[Here Mr. WISE was interrupted by several gentlemen, and told that Mr. TURNEY had withdrawn his objection]

Mr. WISE. Will gentlemen, then, agree that we shall enter at once upon the credentials, and that these resolutions shall be considered as rescinded? Will gentlemen consent to take the direct vote?

[Cries of "yes, yes," on all sides]

The CHAIR then put the question on rescinding the resolution of Mr. DROMGOOLE, and it was carried in the affirmative unanimously.

Mr. WISE. Then I offer the following resolution, and call for the previous question on it:

Resolved, That J. BANKER AYCRIGG, J. P. B. MAXWELL, WILLIAM HALSTED, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS JONES YORKE, are entitled to their seats.

Mr. PICKENS said he asked it as a personal favor that the gentleman from Virginia would insert the constitutional word "returns," in his resolution.

Mr. WISE. No sir; no sir.

Mr. CRAIG then moved a call of the House, which was seconded on all sides, and carried. The names of the members having been then called over by the CLERK, it was ascertained that there were four or five absentees, among whom was Mr. HAWES of Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE informed the House that Mr. HAWES was absent from sickness, and moved that he be excused.

Mr. CRAIG moved that the absentees be sent for; which was carried.

Mr. WISE said if gentlemen would permit it at this time, when they were doing nothing, he would modify his resolution. Some gentlemen around him seemed to think that his resolution settled the final question as to the seats of the members from New Jersey, and he would therefore withdraw his resolution and offer the following, for which he found a precedent in the proceedings of the House.

Resolved, That the credentials of the following members, J. BANKER AYCRIGG, J. P. B. MAXWELL, WM. HALSTED, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS JONES YORKE, are sufficient to entitle them to take seats in the House, leaving the question of contested election to be afterwards decided by the House.

Mr. PICKENS objected to the change in the form of the resolution, because it changed the issue. There was but a shadow of difference between the original and substitute; but in these times, Mr. P. said, shadows count.

Mr. WISE replied, that he only bound himself to offer a direct proposition; and the resolution he now offered was as much so as the original.

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped the previous question might not be carried. He should vote against the last proposition, as well as against the original, and hoped the House would not second the call for the previous question.

After some few remarks from Mr. WISE,

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked if the call for the previous question had been seconded by the House, and demanded that the question on seconding the call be put now.

Mr. PICKENS observed that he had not the slightest objections himself to voting on the resolution as modified. He understood the gentleman to read the resolution to the House as part of his proposition, and he [Mr. P.] then objected to the language of it, and requested the gentleman to insert the constitutional word "returns," which he refused to do. The very slight change made by the gentleman in the resolution, might affect the votes of one or two gentlemen; and it was for this reason he opposed it. He might be mistaken; but his understanding was, that the original resolution, as offered by the gentleman from Virginia, was a part of the proposition that was acceded to on all sides.

Mr. WISE. I will ease the fears of the gentleman. I understand he had a resolution ready to offer yesterday, providing that Mr. DICKERSON and his associates should take their seats as members from New Jersey. Now I will make a fair proposition to the gentleman. I will withdraw my resolution, and let him offer his in its stead.

Mr. PICKENS. I prefer the gentleman's resolution, because it is an affirmative proposition.

On taking the vote, the call for the previous question was seconded by the House.

The question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The main question was then taken by yeas and nays, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 117, nays 117, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Black, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. So it was decided by the House that Messrs. AYCRIGG, MAXWELL, STRATTON, YORKE, and HALSTED, shall not take their seats as Representatives from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of Maine then offered a resolution that the House would now proceed to the election of a Speaker.

Mr. WISE. I ask if this is carrying out in fairness my proposition [Cries of "yes, yes—your resolution has been offered and decided against."]

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1839. VOLUME 8.....No. 4.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

The House has decided, said Mr. W. that Messrs. AYCRIGG, YORKE, STRATTON, MAXWELL, and HALSTED, shall not be admitted as members, but it has not decided who shall take their seats as members from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. The House has decided not less than six times that those gentleman from New Jersey who claim under the Governor's commission shall not be permitted to take their seats.

Mr. MERCER here moved that the House adjourn; and Messrs. GRIFFIN and DAVIS being appointed tellers, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 113, nays 117.

Mr. SMITH of Maine called for the reading of his resolution, and moved the previous question on it.

The CHAIR was proceeding to read the resolution, (Mr. SMITH still retaining the floor,) when

Mr. PROFFIT rose amid loud cries of "order, order," and said that he rose to a point of order. He wanted to know whether a gentleman could move a resolution, and, before it was debated, move the previous question on it?

Mr. SMITH was understood to say that he was only following the example set by the gentleman from Virginia before him [Mr. WISE.]

Mr. PROFFIT. I ask whether it is in order for a gentleman, because he has a sufficiency of lungs to enable him to drown the voices of all the rest, to propose a resolution, and then move the previous question? I say that it is not in order.

[Here Mr. PROFFIT was loudly called to order from various parts of the hall, and took his seat.]

Mr JOHNSON of Maryland. I make a further point of order, and ask if the gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor?

Here something like order was restored, and the CLERK proceeded to read the resolution, when

Mr. SMITH moved the previous question on it.

Mr. WISE rose to a point of order. By the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] he said this House had determined that it would decide the question as to who should be received as the Representatives from the State of New Jersey before going into the election of a Speaker. He called for the reading of that resolution, and appealed to the consciences of gentlemen whether they would not carry out a resolution adopted by their own votes.

Mr. SMITH. My conscience is perfectly at rest as far as the gentleman from Virginia is concerned. That resolution was voted against by the gentleman, and was, by the general consent of the whole House, considered as reconsidered.

[Here Mr. SMITH was interrupted by loud and repeated calls to order, from the Opposition members. A violent uproar ensued—Mr. SMITH defending his right to the floor, and attempting to proceed with his remarks, while the cries of "Order, order," were continued, so as to prevent him from being heard.]

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, at this stage of the proceedings, addressed the CHAIR, and said a few words, the only part of which heard by the reporter was, "I'll make him sit down if you'll order me."

Mr. SMITH still retaining his place on the floor, and endeavoring to make himself heard,

The CHAIR was understood to direct him to take his seat, and Mr. S. sat down. The noise and confusion was so great, however, that the reporter could not hear what the CHAIR said.

Mr. WISE called for the reading of Mr. RHETT's resolution, when the clamor instantly ceased, and the resolution was read.

Mr. WISE said: I submit the point of order, whether that resolution of Mr. RHETT is not imperative? Gentlemen cannot waive that resolution. They have, under the dispensation of Providence, by which we have been deprived of the vote of a member, who is confined to his sick bed, [Mr. HAWES,] been able to bring us to a tie, and thus defeat the resolution I offered for Mr. AYCRIGG and his associates to take their seats as Representatives from New Jersey. I put it to gentlemen whether it is in good faith to pass over the resolution they have adopted? I put it to their consciences, and ask them if they dare waive the claims of Messrs. DICKERSON and VROOM, and their associates? If they do, will it not be considered that those claims were a pretence from the beginning? Do you now say, gentlemen, that you have played out the play, and that these claims were but a sham from the beginning?

Mr. SMITH observed that the question was upon his resolution, and that he had never taken his seat since he presented it. [Here Mr. S. was again interrupted with such loud and repeated cries of "order, order!" that it was impossible to hear what he said.]

Mr. VANDERPOEL observed that he commended the motives and conduct of the gentleman from Virginia, when he introduced his resolution, which he hoped would calm the tempest which had been raging round them for twelve days. Let me explain the position in which this House was, said Mr. V. when that resolution was offered. The whole morning was consumed in useless debate on a question of amending the journal. A resolution had been submitted by the gentleman from Virginia, for carrying into effect the very proposition which he now says the House is bound to carry out, though he opposed that proposition at the outset, and had taken the floor this morning in support of the motion to reconsider it. While the gentleman was on the floor, he reproached us with wasting time on preliminary matters. He called out to us to march boldly up to the main question. We took him at his word—we have taken the vote, and his resolution has been rejected. There is thus, said Mr. V. an end of the whole matter.

Mr. WISE here explained that the object of his intended speech was to dispense with the resolution for the appointment of a committee, in order to bring the House to decide, under the resolution of the gentlemen from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] who should be considered members from the State of New Jersey. By that resolution, the House had imperatively decided that, before going into the election of a Speaker, it would decide this question.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said it amounted to the same thing. The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] was only carrying out the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, and appointing agencies for that purpose. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was contending for a repeal of the resolution, he proposed that we should march to the direct question boldly, and every gentleman believed that it was a waiver of all preliminary matters.

Mr. GALBRAITH rose to a point of order, and asked if a question of order was debatable?

Mr. WISE. I appeal to my honorable colleague from the Norfolk district, if he did not ask me whether the decision, as to the right of the members holding the certificates of the Governor, would preclude the right of deciding as to the claims of the others?

The CHAIR here said that the resolution that had been adopted by the House, was not reconsidered, and was still in force. The question that was taken, was taken by universal consent, and did not set aside the resolution. The motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] was, however, considered by the CHAIR to be in order, although there are resolutions in the journal which have not been disposed of.

Mr. SMITH again moved the previous question on his resolution.

Mr. WHITE appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. GRAVES moved an adjournment; and on that question he called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken on Mr. GRAVES's motion, which was decided in the negative—yeas 109, nays 119.

Mr. DUNCAN asked if the previous question had been called on the resolution.

The CHAIR answered that it had, but the question now was on the appeal of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE rose and proceeded to make some remarks, when

Mr. BRIGGS appealed to the CHAIR whether the question on an appeal was debatable.

Mr CAVE JOHNSON requested the CLERK to read the rule which declares that questions of order, of appeal, &c. are not debatable; which was done.

Mr. WHITE continued his remarks, and was repeatedly called to order; and

Mr. SMITH of Maine appealed to the CHAIR to decide whether the gentleman was in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved to lay the appeal on the table; but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved an adjournment; but afterwards withdrew the motion.

Mr. WISE renewed the motion to adjourn, and called for the yeas and nays.

The question having been taken, the House refused to adjourn—yeas 107, nays 116.

Mr. WHITE moved that his appeal, and the resolution of Mr. SMITH, be laid on the table.

Messrs. GRAVES and WHITE asked for a call of the House; and

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, the yeas and nays were ordered on taking that question, and they resulted in—yeas 84, nays 125.

Mr. THOMAS then moved a division of Mr. WHITE's motion, when

Mr. WHITE withdrew his motion, and moved to lay Mr. SMITH's resolution on the table; and

Mr. DUNCAN called for the previous question on that motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. WHITE's motion, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 105, nays 113.

Mr EVERETT appealed to his friends to withdraw further opposition. We are fairly beaten, said he, and let us submit like men. If the gentleman from Maine would agree to modify his resolution, so as to go into the election of Speaker to-morrow at twelve o'clock, instead of now, he would no longer oppose it.

Mr. SMITH. Agreed, agreed!

Mr. WISE. I give gentlemen of this House fair warning, that I wash my hands of all agreements. I stand upon my rights, and will not acknowledge myself beaten until I know I am so.

Mr. SMITH rose and made some remarks, which it was impossible to hear from the uproar that immediately ensued. During loud cries of "order, order," Mr. S. was heard to say, "I rise to a point of order."

Mr. WISE replied, you are in the midst of disorder.

Mr. SMITH. I know it, sir.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 108, nays 117.

Mr. SMITH of Maine. The question is now on my resolution to proceed to the election of a Speaker, and I beg the CHAIR to understand that I did not accept of any modification, unless gentlemen would agree to proceed to an election to-morrow. Gentlemen before me refused to do so; therefore my resolution stands as originally offered.

Mr. BYNUM then moved the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. PROFFIT moved to lay the resolution on the table until to-morrow at two o'clock. [Many voices, "not in order."]

Mr. WISE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw that motion, and let the gentleman do the deed.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GRAVES moved a call of the House, so that there might be a full vote on this resolution.

Mr. ATHERTON called the attention of the CHAIR to the rule which declared that a call of the House was not in order, after the main question had been ordered.

The CHAIR voted that the motion for a call of the House was out of order.

Mr. STANLY moved that the House now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANLY then withdrew the motion for an adjournment.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMITH's resolution, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 110.

Mr. PROFFITT moved that the House do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were called for, which were ordered, and were—yeas 98, nays 121. So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PROFFIT rose, and moved to reconsider the vote on the resolution to proceed to the election of a Speaker, and stated that he did so with a view of submitting a series of resolutions, which he read. He then addressed the House for about fifteen minutes in support of his proposition.

Mr. JENIFER next obtained the floor, and spoke about ten minutes, contending that the House had acted inconsistently in the course it had pursued; when he gave way to

Mr. GRAVES, who stated that, as the hour was late, and the gentleman had lengthy notes, he moved that the House adjourn, and called the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered, and were—yeas 98, nays 119.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Maine then moved the previous question.

Mr. JENIFER rose and stated that he had not yielded the floor.

The CHAIR stated that the previous question was moved.

Mr. JENIFER would appeal to any honorable gentleman to say whether he was not entitled to the floor. He would appeal to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] to say whether he was not entitled to the floor.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said that question had been made to the CHAIR, and it would be indelicate for him to interfere in it.

Mr. GRAVES appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and stated that he intended to speak on the subject.

Mr. TURNEY called for the reading of the 45th rule, which declares that no debate shall take place on incidental questions after the previous question had been moved.

Mr. DUNCAN said he thought the gentleman from Maryland was entitled to the floor by the usages of the House.

The CHAIR said that it was true that such had been the usage of the House; but as there was no rule on the subject, and as he had heard the gentleman from Maine first, he considered it his duty to entertain the motion.

Mr. SMITH said he had understood that the gentleman intended merely to speak against time, and, therefore, he had moved the motion for the previous question; but, if the gentleman was desirous of going on, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. JENIFER occupied the time of the House for about an hour, in denunciation of the Administration party in the House, for the course it had pursued in reference to the resolution of Mr. RHETT, which he contended should have been carried out by investigating the claims of Messrs. DICKERSON and his four colleagues claiming seats, previous to the election of Speaker. He accused the party with acting in bad faith throughout the whole proceeding. He censured the course which the CLERK had pursued in refusing in the first instance to call the members from Jersey, and for refusing to put motions to a vote of the House, when he was the only presiding officer; and that he had acted in accordance with the promptings of the Globe. He disapprobated the course of the Administration party, in endeavoring to organize the House by the election of Speaker at this time; and after some general remarks, without yielding the floor, Mr. J. made a motion to adjourn; upon which motion,

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 101, nays 117.

So the House again refused to adjourn.

Mr. JENIFER continued his remarks for some time. He again reiterated that New Jersey should be represented in the election of Speaker; that it was the duty of those whom the Administration party claimed as being entitled to seats, to come forward and have their pretensions canvassed. He believed the whole to be a miserable humbug; and that the course adopted by the House, was a violation of State sovereignty, and in conflict with the doctrines of State Rights, professed by many of the new members—referring at the same time to the members from the State of Georgia.

Mr. SALTONSTALL addressed the House at considerable length, deprecating the practice of introducing party names in the course of debate here, and contending that the members from New Jersey who held the Governor's certificates were entitled to seats on the floor of the House, and asserting that if he was placed in the same situation of those gentlemen, he would demand his right to a seat; and when a Speaker was elected, he would claim to be qualified as a member of the House. He argued that those gentlemen were entitled to seats, according to all law and usage, and deprecated the practice of departing from well settled principles of the laws.

Mr. STEINROD then obtained the floor, and said that as three gentlemen who were opposed to the previous question had addressed the House, he would now, as a friend to that question, demand the previous question.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved a call of the House, and upon that motion called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 106, nays 114. So the House refused to order the call.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question, which was on the motion to reconsider the resolution to proceed to the election of a Speaker, was then put.

The yeas and nays were demanded on this question, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 108, nays 120.

Mr. PICKENS inquired what would be the first business in order, in case the House now adjourned?

The CHAIR stated that the first business in order would be the election of a Speaker.

Mr. PICKENS then moved an adjournment.

Mr. DROMGOOLE stated that that would not be the first motion in order, and asked the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. PICKENS then withdrew the motion.

Mr. GRAVES renewed it, and the yeas and nays were called; which were ordered, and were—yeas 113, nays 116.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WISE rose to submit a question of order. He wished to know if it was in order to move a resolution resolving that Messrs. AYCRIGG, STRATTON, MAXWELL, HALSTED, and YORKE, be allowed to vote in the election of Speaker.

The CHAIR decided that it was in order.

Mr. WISE then read his resolution.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I appeal from that decision of the CHAIR.

Mr WISE said he did not yield the floor, and gentlemen could not appeal until he yielded the floor. He would prefer that the House would adjourn until to-morrow, but if gentlemen would not agree to adjourn, he would proceed with his remarks to-night. Mr. W. was proceeding—

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose to a point of order.

Mr. WISE said he would not yield the floor; gentlemen might make their point of order after he had concluded his remarks. Mr. W. was again proceeding—

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS rose to a point of order, and pointed the CHAIR to the rule which requires a member to take his seat when he was called to order. He wished to know if it was in order for a gentleman to discuss the merits of his resolution upon an appeal.

Mr. WISE. No appeal has been taken, because I did not yield the floor.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS then made a point of order, whether a gentleman could submit a proposition to reverse the decision of the House, and go on and discuss that proposition directly contrary to the opinion of the majority of the House.

The CHAIR again stated that he considered the motion in order.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS. Then I appeal from that decision.

Mr. WISE. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS. Has not the CHAIR made a decision? If so, I have appealed from it.

The CHAIR said he had no decision to make.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS. Can there be a plainer proposition than the one I have submitted to the CHAIR? A member has a right to appeal from any decision.

Mr. WISE said he would not yield the floor. He then proceeded with his remarks for some time; when he gave way to

Mr. TRIPLETT, who moved that the House adjourn.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were called, and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 111, nays 117.

The CHAIR was then understood to say that the reason why he decided that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was in order, was because of a solemn vote by this House that it would not proceed to the election of a Speaker until it was decided who were entitled to seats as Representatives from New Jersey; and he did not consider that the decision of the House of to-day, which deprived the gentlemen from New Jersey of their seats was binding, because it would be tantamount to an expulsion, which would require a vote of two-thirds to decide

Mr. WISE then said that he believed, from conversations with his colleagues, that he was somewhat out of order in not yielding the floor for an appeal, and he would now yield it to his colleague to take an appeal, with the understanding that he would have the privilege of addressing the House after that question was decided.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and moved the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. WISE then said that, in order to relieve the CHAIR and the House from difficulty, he would withdraw his resolution, if gentlemen would agree to adjourn until to-morrow. [Many voices, "agreed!"]

Mr. WISE then withdrew his resolution, when

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved an adjournment.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 117, nays 109.

The House then adjourned at 12 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, December 14, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States.

Mr. WHITE said that it occurred to him there was some business that might be done by the Senate. He thought it a tiresome proceeding in daily coming to the Capitol, and returning home again. He would therefore suggest that the presiding officer of the Senate should be empowered to appoint the standing committees, with the exception of the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition is, with the assent of the Senate, to suspend the 34th rule, and that the presiding officer shall proceed to the appointment of the standing committees of the Senate, with the exception of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NORVELL considered that the appointment of the Committee on Commerce was as necessary as the appointment of any other committee. We have nominations daily coming in, if he might be allowed to allude to them, which should be referred to that committee; and he therefore hoped that it would not be omitted.

Mr. ALLEN did not see any imaginable reason why all the committees should not be appointed; but, on the contrary, there were many reasons why they should be. Senators wished to ascertain on what committees they were to be placed, so that they might qualify themselves to examine the peculiar subjects submitted to them, and employ what leisure they had in acquiring such information as would enable them to discharge their duties with promptness and fidelity.

Mr. WHITE then submitted his resolution, which provided that the presiding officer of the Senate should appoint the standing committees, with the exception of the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who should, previously to the appointment of such committees, be balloted for by the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that the course proposed, was precisely similar to that adopted at the last session, as might be ascertained by a reference to the journal. It was then provided that the presiding office should appoint the standing committees, with the exception—for reasons then, as now, well understood—of the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He saw no objection to the adoption of the resolution at the present time.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The Senate then proceeded to elect, by ballot, a Chairman of the Committee on Commerce; and the ballots being counted, the result was announced to be,

Whole number of votes - - -	28
For WILLIAM R. KING - - -	26
JOHN DAVIS - - - -	2

Mr. KING was therefore elected,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, December 14, 1839.

The journal having been read,

Mr. WISE inquired of the CHAIR whether the vote on the motion to reconsider Mr. RHETT's resolution was recorded on the journal.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. WISE said he was satisfied.

The CHAIR then stated that the subject before the House, according to the vote of the House yesterday, was on proceeding to the election of a Speaker.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved a call of the House, which was ordered; and the roll having been called over, it appeared that members had answered to their names.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved that the absentees be sent for; which motion was agreed to.

All the members then answered to their names, except Messrs. HAWES and KEMPSHALL.

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved that the further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 141, nays 87.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That J. B. AYCRIGG, WM HALSTED, JNO P. B. MAXWELL, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS JONES YORKE, are entitled to vote in the organization of the House until excluded by a majority of uncontested votes.

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to the reception of this resolution. The House had decided, but yesterday, that those persons were not entitled to hold seats, and it could not possibly be in order.

Mr. WHITE denied that the House had ever decided that the members from New Jersey were not entitled to their seats. A majority of the uncontested members had never decided that question; therefore those gentlemen were entitled to their seats as the Representatives of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose to a question of order. Was the question of reception debatable?

The CHAIR. That question is debatable.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. Then I appeal from that decision, and move the previous question upon the appeal.

Mr. WHITE said he hoped the gentleman would not attempt to force such a rule as this upon the House. The previous question, he had no doubt, would come soon enough, but gentlemen could not move it yet.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. I call the gentleman to order, and demand that the CHAIR shall enforce the rules.

Mr. WHITE still proceeding, denied that the question as to the right of the New Jersey members to take their seats, had been decided by a majority of the uncontested members. The majority of the House had never settled that question, and he held that, by the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, which had been adopted as the standing order of the House, the House was bound, before it proceeded to the election of a Speaker, to decide as to who were entitled to seats from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. VANDERPOEL again called the gentleman to order, and insisted that the rules of the House should be enforced.

The CHAIR said the question before the House was on the question of reception.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. That is not the question. The CHAIR had decided that the question of reception was debatable, and from that decision he (Mr. V.) had appealed, and had moved the previous question on the appeal.

The CHAIR. Then the question is on the appeal, and on that question the previous question is moved

Mr. WISE would merely ask if the question of reception had not always been decided to be debatable.

Mr. LEWIS then read the 5th rule in relation to the reception of motions.

The CHAIR said the gentleman had read no rule which prevented debate.

After a few words on the point by Messrs. POPE and WISE,

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to lay the question of reception on the table.

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and were—yeas 119, nays 115.

So the question was laid on the table.

Mr. PICKENS inquired what was the order of business before the House, and whether the resolution adopted last evening, to proceed forthwith to the election of a Speaker, should not come up first. If so, he hoped that the House would proceed at once to the execution of that resolution.

Mr. PROFFIT here rose, and said he had a resolution to submit; but

The CHAIR said that it would not be in order.

Mr. PROFFIT said he rose to a point of order. The resolution adopted last evening was, that the House should go into the election of a Speaker. The resolution that he proposed to offer, was to regulate the manner of going into that election. Mr. P. here read a resolution to give the Whig candidates a right to vote in the election of Speaker.

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to the reception of the resolution, as being out of order; and

The CHAIR decided that it was not in order for Mr. P. to submit his resolution.

Mr. BARNARD rose, and said that he had drawn up a resolution which he proposed to submit at this time, and which he believed to be perfectly in order. The purport of it was to suspend the execution of the order for going at this time into the election of a Speaker. It was true that the House had resolved to go into such election this morning, but that resolve was not binding on the House, which had the power to suspend it at any time, in accordance with the settled rules of parliamentary practice. Mr. B. here read his resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the execution of the order of this House, adopted yesterday, that the House do proceed to the election of Speaker, be suspended, to give opportunity to any member who may be so disposed, to move the House that the members proceed, in the first place, to hear and adjudge, pursuant to a resolution of this House, heretofore adopted, upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of persons who appear to be contesting seats on this floor from New Jersey, or to move that the names of JNO. B. AYCRIGG, JNO. P. B. MAXWELL, WILLIAM HALSTED, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOS. JONES YORKE, the regular return members from the State of New Jersey, be not called, or their votes counted, in the election of Speaker, or to move that PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, DANIEL B. RYALL, WILLIAM R. COOPER, and JOSEPH KILLE, be called, and their votes counted in the election of Speaker.

Mr. B. said that he now proposed to discuss the subject of that resolution.

Mr. CRAIG objected to the reception of the resolution, which he considered to be out of order, while there was a resolution before the House that had precedence of it.

Mr. BEATTY rose to a point of order, and referred to the rules of the House, from which he proceeded to show that the resolution could not with propriety be received.

Mr. BARNARD observed that if the point of order was persisted in, he asked that the member who raised it should be required to reduce it to writing.

Mr. BEATTY was proceeding to discuss the point of order, when he was required by the CHAIR to put it in writing, which he did as follows:

The point of order suggested is, that under the 52d rule of the House, no motion or any other business shall be received, without special leave of the House, until the unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment, shall have been disposed of.

Mr. PETRIKIN observed that the rules also provided that, when a member is called to order, he shall take his seat. He asked, therefore, that the member from New York be required to take his seat.

Mr. LEADBETTER took the ground that no business could be originated to take precedence of this resolution, to go into the election of Speaker, which the CHAIR pronounced to be the first thing in order this morning; and insisted that the rules of the House be preserved in that particular.

The CHAIR said that he referred the decision of the question of order to the House itself.

Mr. BEATTY demanded either the decision of the CHAIR, or that he would put the question, to enable the House to decide it.

Mr. BARNARD claimed the floor, and was determined not to yield it until it should be decided against him either by the CHAIR or the House. If the member on the opposite side had a point of order, let him reduce it to writing.

Mr. BEATTY. I have made my point of order, and reduced it to writing, and demand the decision of the CHAIR or the House upon it.

Mr. BARNARD. It is the point of order I am proceeding to debate—

[Here several members were heard crying out that a point of order was not debatable.]

Mr. DUNCAN. Do I understand the CHAIRMAN that he refuses to decide the question of order?

The CHAIR replied that he had referred the decision of it to the House itself.

Mr. BYNUM. Then why not let the House decide it?

Mr. DUNCAN said that it seemed to him very extraordinary that the CHAIR would neither decide the question himself, nor, by putting it to the House, enable the House to decide it.

Mr. BARNARD contended that he had a right to the floor, and, unless decided by the CHAIR or the House to be out of order, had a right to go on with his remarks.

Mr. BEATTY, [addressing Mr. BARNARD] You have not the floor, sir, unless you usurp it. There is a resolution which has precedence of all other business, and you have no right to push it as decided by originating new business.

Mr. BARNARD. I intend to debate the point of order as soon as I can have the ear of the House.

Mr. BEATTY. You are not in order, and I demand that you take your seat till the point is decided.

Mr. RIVES. If the CHAIR will not decide the point of order, will he do the House the favor to put the question and let the House decide it.

The CLERK here, at the instance of a member, read the twenty-fifth rule, requiring a member to take his seat, when called to order, until the question of order is decided; and also providing that all questions of order and appeals shall be decided without debate.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS made a few observations, which were not heard.

The CHAIR here decided that Mr. BARNARD had a right to proceed with his remarks: but the grounds on which the CHAIR made the decision were not heard by the reporter.

Mr. STANLY observed that the resolution adopted last evening that the House would proceed to the election of a Speaker, was dead; that it applied to last evening only, and was not now before the House. In confirmation of this opinion, Mr. S. said that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] was overheard last evening urging his friends to proceed with the election, and giving it as his opinion that, if they adjourned without carrying the resolution into effect, the resolution would die with the proceedings of the day, and they would have to proceed de novo in the morning.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he would not make any remark with regard to the propriety of repeating what a gentleman might say to his friends. He would admit that he did express the fear to his friends that the resolution would be considered as expiring with that evening's proceedings; but he expressed no decided opinion on it. He was, however, overruled by his friends, who, on all sides, declared that the resolution would be imperative this morning. He would ask if it was not the understanding with all the gentleman's friends last evening, that the resolution would be in force this morning. At least, he understood that the gentleman from North Carolina, and all his friends, entertained that opinion. He would ask if it was not the understanding on all sides of the House that the resolution would be the first thing in order this morning?

After some remarks from Mr. STANLY,

Mr. WISE denied that there was such a general understanding; for he entertained the opinion that the resolution of last night, that they would then go into the election of Speaker, was dead as soon as the House adjourned. One remark he would make before he sat down. For the last six years he had been witnessing the triumphs of the great Republican party, and, thank God, they had now brought down that party to so lean a majority, that they now have to jockey in order to win the race.

Mr. JAMESON referred to the decision made by the CHAIR, that the resolution for going into the election of Speaker, passed last evening, was the first business in order this morning. And quoting the one hundred and twenty-sixth rule of the House he argued the point of order, contending that the House could entertain no other proposition until that was disposed of.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] and the question of order arising on it, be laid on the table.

Mr. BARNARD here raised a point of order, with regard to Mr. TURNEY's motion, which he reduced to writing, as follows:

A point of order having been made, that a resolution offered by Mr. BARNARD was not in order, at this time pending the discussion on that point of order, Mr. TURNEY rises and moves to lay the subject of the point of order on the table; and also, at the same time, to lay the resolution of Mr. BARNARD on the table. On this motion of Mr. TURNEY, Mr. BARNARD makes this point of order: "That it is not now in order to move to lay the resolution of Mr. BARNARD on the table.

The CHAIR decided that the motion of Mr. TURNEY was in order; when,

Mr. FILLMORE rose and said, that, considering this question to be one of vital importance, not only at the present moment, but as a precedent for the future action of the House, he would appeal from the decision of the CHAIR. According to the decision of the CHAIR, a member who had a resolution to offer could be compelled to sit down on a point of order before he had time to explain it; and then his resoution was taken from him, while his mouth was shut by a motion to lay the whole subject on the table. This decision (said Mr. F.) may affect all of us hereafter; and, I therefore, appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. TURNEY called for the previous question on the appeal; and

Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the appeal, and every matter relating to it, on the table.

Mr. MERCER observed that the laying the appeal on the table would have the effect of affirming the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. LEWIS observed that there was great confusion prevailing in the Hall, so that it was difficult to understand the true question before the House. He thought the House would be relieved from its present difficulty by the point of order which he now wished to make. He would ask of the CHAIR, if it was not announced by him this morning, that the resolution on the election of Speaker, passed last evening, was the first business in order? He asked the CHAIR to determine that point of order.

The CHAIR made no reply.

Mr. LEWIS repeated his inquiry of the CHAIR.

[Great confusion prevailing, and frequent calls for the question, mingled with cries of "Order," "order."]

Mr. GRANGER said a few words, which, in the noise that prevailed, were not heard.

The question on seconding the call for the previous question was then taken, Messrs. BANKS and CARTER being tellers, and carried—ayes 116, noes not counted.

The vote was then taken on ordering the main question to be put, and carried without a division.

Mr. CRAIG called for the yeas and nays on the main question, and they were accordingly ordered.

Mr. ALFORD asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] to withdraw his resolution, and let the House go into the election of Speaker. The Administration party had disfranchised New Jersey, and the Opposition had not the power to prevent it. The issue was with the people. He was tired of fighting on the outpost, and was ready to meet the question.

Mr. CRABB agreed with his friend from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] that it would be better to go into the election of Speaker at once; and he would give notice to his political friends that he would not go with them in delaying that decision, by making appeals and points of order. He thought it was now high time to go into the election.

Mr. BARNARD said he acceded to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD.] But he wished it to be expressly and distinctly understood that he did it because he saw that the majority of the House was determined on the course it would pursue with regard to his proposition, and the remarks he intended to offer in support of it. Upon that belief he yielded to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia; and he did so because, in his conscience, he desired to save the House from the evils that would ensue, if it now solemnly decided against the point of order he had raised.

Mr. CRAIG moved a call of the House, which was ordered; and the roll having been called over, and the absentees having been sent for; after some time,

The House then proceeded to the election of a Speaker.

The first vote having been taken, and before the result was announced,

Mr. YORKE, one of the gentlemen commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey, rose and asked if the roll had been called through. No answer being returned to him, he said he perceived that in calling the roll his name was omitted. He held a commission, he said, from the Governor of New Jersey as a Representative from that State, and therefore demanded that his vote be received. He voted for JOHN BELL. After which,

Messrs. STRATTON, AYCRIGG, MAXWELL and HALSTED successively demanded that their votes be read as Representatives from the State of New Jersey, and said that they voted for JOHN BELL.

The tellers then reported to the CHAIR the result of the vote to be—235 votes given, and 118 necessary to a choice—of these

FIRST BALLOT.

FOR W. C. DAWSON.—Messrs. Alford, Bell, Colquitt, M. A. Cooper, Habersham, Hopkins, T. B. King, Nisbet, W. Thompson, jr. Warren, and Black—11

FOR D. H. LEWIS.—Messrs John Campbell, Griffin, and J. W. Jones—3.

FOR F. W. PICKENS.—Messrs. C. Fisher, Holmes, Hunter, J. Rogers, and Sumpter—5

FOR G. W. HOPKINS.—Mr. J. Garland—1.

Mr. WISE inquired if the report of the tellers included the votes of the five gentlemen who held commissions from the Governor of New Jersey? He understood that they were not, and he therefore required of the CHAIR to put the question whether the votes of these gentlemen shall be counted.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. I rise to ask of the tellers whether they have counted all the votes? and, if they have, I demand that the vote be announced by the CHAIR.

Mr. MERCER rose to move for a reconsideration of the resolution of yesterday for going into the election of SPEAKER.

The CHAIR said the motion was not in order.

Mr. WISE. I make no motion, but I wish to state the fact that there are five gentlemen from New Jersey here who claim to vote, and therefore ask the CHAIR to state that fact to the House, and take its decision upon it.

The CHAIR then announced the result of the vote to the House, stating the number of votes given to each person voted for. The CHAIR then informed the House that five gentlemen from the State of New Jersey, who held the commissions of the Governor of that State, demanded to have their votes taken before the result was announced.

After some remarks from Mr. WISE,

The CHAIR said that there appearing not to be a majority of votes given to any one person, the House would proceed to vote again.

The CLERK commenced calling the roll for a second vote; when

Mr. MERCER rose and interrupted him, and demanded of the CHAIR to receive his motion.

[Loud cries of "order, order," and "go on, go on," and much confusion throughout the hall.]

The CHAIR said that the House was voting for a Speaker, and the gentleman's motion was not in order while that was going on.

Mr. MERCER said he rose to a point of order, and demanded a decision on it. I appeal, said he, from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. WISE. Certainly my colleague has a right to appeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

The CHAIR said he could not put the question on this appeal while the vote was being taken.

[Universal laughter.]

The CLERK was proceeding with the call, when

Mr. GRAVES interrupted him again, and observed that he understood the gentleman from Virginia as appealing from the decision of the CHAIR. Now he would not yield the floor till the House decided that appeal.

[Loud cries of "order, order."]

The CHAIR called the gentleman to order, and said that he had decided that the appeal could not be made while the CLERK was calling the roll.

Mr. GRAVES said he could not consent that, when an appeal was taken from the decion of the CHAIR, the CLERK should continue calling the roll.

Mr. MERCER rose, and made a few remarks, which, from the noise and confusion, and repeated calls to order, it was impossible to hear.

Mr. WISE said, in order to illustrate the position of my colleague, I will state that the CHAIR decides that he cannot put the question on his appeal while the election is going on. Now, from that very decision, my colleague has a right to appeal.

The CHAIR said the motion of the gentleman could be offered when a Speaker was chosen; but he could not take an appeal while the House was in the act of electing a Speaker.

Mr. WISE. Then here is a decision that an appeal cannot be taken. Is it not competent for my colleague to take an appeal from the decision?

The CHAIR. Certainly not, sir. [Loud laughter.]

The CLERK was then suffered to proceed with the call of the roll; after which, the tellers reported the result of the second vote to be—

SECOND BALLOT.

FOR JOHN W. JONES—Messrs. Judson Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. J. Wagner, E. D. White, John White, T. W. Williams, L. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, S. Williams, and Wise—99.

FOR W. C. DAWSON—Messrs. Alford, Bell, Black, Habersham, Hopkins, Hunt, W. C. Johnson, King, Nisbet, W. Thompson, Jr. and Warten—11.

FOR D. H. LEWIS—Messrs. John Campbell, Mark A. Cooper, Griffin, J. W. Jones, and Colquitt—5.

FOR F. W. PICKENS—Messrs. Fisher, Holmes, Hunter, J. Rogers, and Sumter—5.

FOR G. W. HOPKINS—Mr. J. Garland—1.

FOR R. M. T. HUNTER—Mr. Ogle—1.

Mr. MERCER then rose to a question of order.

The CHAIR said he would now entertain the question of order, it not having been in order to receive it when it was first made, during the call of the roll.

Mr. MERCER stated that his object in doing so was that he might move a reconsideration of the resolution of his colleague, [Mr. WISE,] which had been negatived on yesterday by a tie vote. He read the rule on the subject, and stated that a motion to reconsider was made by the rules, because of some error in the decision, and in this case he thought presumption of error might be considered as manifest, from the fact that the vote was equally divided. Mr. M. concluded by moving to reconsider the vote by which Mr. WISE's resolution, providing for the call of the New Jersey members, had been rejected.

The CHAIR said he considered the gentleman's motion not to be in order, because, the vote having been a tie vote, there was no majority in the case, and the rule in the case the CHAIR did not understand as applying to this case. It was undoubtedly in the power of the House, if they thought proper to put that construction upon the rule, to reconsider. The rule is, whenever there was a vote taken, a member who voted in the majority might move to reconsider; but in the present case there was no majority—there was a tie—an equal vote on both sides, and the question was declared to be lost, only in consequence of the technical rule of the House. There being no majority, the CHAIRMAN did not feel himself at liberty to consider as in order a motion made for reconsideration on either side of the question.

Mr. MERCER appealed from this decision.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question on the appeal, which was seconded unanimously—the main question ordered, and the decision of the CHAIR sustained—yeas 147, nays 84.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved that the House adjourn; but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the motion, but the House refused to adjourn.

The House then proceeded to a third ballot for a Speaker, and the result being announced, it appeared to be as follow:

THIRD BALLOT.

FOR JOHN W. JONES.—Messrs. Jud. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, W. O. Butler, S. H. FOR FRANCIS W. PICKENS.—Messrs. J. Campbell, Fisher, Griffin, Holmes, Hunter, J. Rogers, and Sumter—7.

FOR ROBERT M. T. HUNTER.—Messrs. J. Cooper, Henry, Naylor, Ogle, and Simonton—5.

FOR JOHN BELL.—Mr. Dawson—1.

FOR JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.—Mr. Gates—1.

FOR JOHN C. CLARK.—Mr. James Garland—1.

The House then proceeded to a fourth ballot, and the result being announced, appeared as follows:

FOURTH BALLOT.

Mr. R. M. T. HUNTER, having received a majority of the whole number of votes on the eleventh vote, was declared duly elected.

Mr. BANKS and Mr. LAWRENCE conducted the SPEAKER to the chair, when,

On motion of Mr. WISE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 17, 1839.

The CHAIR desired that the Committee on Public Buildings, which he had omitted yesterday, should be placed on the journal, to consist of Mr. FULTON, Chairman, Mr. MERRICK, and Mr. SMITH of Connecticut.

Mr. WRIGHT gave notice that as soon as the Senate was ready to proceed to legislative business, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill more effectually to secure the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters.

A bill for the relief of W. N. Robertson.

A bill for the relief of Samuel H. Garrow and S. W. Simonton.

A bill for the relief of W. A. Whitehead, late collector of the port of Key West, in Florida.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would, on the earliest opportunity, ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill authorizing a patent to be issued to Joseph Campan, for a certain tract of land in the State of Michigan.

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Madam de Lusser.

A bill for the relief of Pierce Balin.

A bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Conway.

A bill for the relief of Daniel Marsaque.

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Elihu H. Bay.

A bill for the relief of Juan Belgar.

A bill for the relief of Francis Laventure, Ebenezer Childs, and Linas Thompson.

A bill for the relief of Joseph Bogy.

A bill for the relief of Joseph Cochran.

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Phil. Barbour, deceased.

A bill for the relief of Charles Morgan of Louisiana.

A bill for the relief of Charles Morgan.

A bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Grainger.

A bill for the relief of Sebastian Butcher and heirs and legal representatives of Bartholomew Butcher, Michael Butcher, and Peter Bloom.

A bill for the relief of Obed P. Lacey.

A bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri.

A bill to transfer to the citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land.

A bill to authorize the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Ricard, deceased.

A bill confirming certain land claims in Missouri.

A bill to confirm certain land claims in the Ouachita land district in the State of Louisiana.

A bill to confirm land claims in the district between the Rio Hondo and Saline rivers.

A bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas.

A bill to amend an act confirming certain land claims in the State of Michigan.

A bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians."

A bill for creating a new land district in the State of Missouri, and for changing the boundaries of the southwestern and western land district in said State.

A bill to confirm the title to a certain tract of land in the county of Mobile.

A bill to confirm certain land claims in the Greensburg land district, State of Louisiana.

Mr. WALKER gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge.

Mr. PRENTISS gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Lemuel White.

A bill for the relief of Daniel Wallas.

A bill for the relief of Margaret Barnes.

A bill to authorize the payment of invalid pensions in certain cases.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land, and for other purposes.

A bill to amend an act confirming certain land claims in the State of Michigan.

A bill granting to certain persons therein named the right of pre-emption to a fraction of a section of land in Ottoway, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. SEVIER gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Murphy.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Jones.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, soon after,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, December 17, 1839.

At 12 o'clock, Mr. R. M. T. HUNTER, Speaker of the House, called the House to order, and addressed them as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

The high and undeserved honor which you have conferred upon me, has been so unexpected, that even now I can scarcely find terms in which to express my grateful sense of you kindness. I trust, however, to be able to offer a better evidence of that sentiment in the earnest efforts which I shall make to discharge my duties justly and impartially. Called as I have been to this high station, not so much from any merits of my own as from the independence of my position, I shall feel it as especially due from me to you to preside as the Speaker, not of a party, but of the House. Whilst I shall deem it my duty, upon all proper occasions, to sustain the principles upon which I stand pledged before the country, I shall hold myself bound, at the same time, to afford every facility within my power to the full and fair expression of the wishes and sentiments of every section of this great Confederacy. You will doubtless deem it your duty, gentlemen, as the grand inquest of the nation, to investigate all matters of which the people ought to be informed; to retrench expenditures which are unnecessary or unconstitutional; to maintain the just relations between all of the great interests of the country, and to preserve inviolate the Constitution, which you will be sworn to support, whilst it will be mine to aid you in such labors with all of the means within my power. And although deeply impressed with a painful sense of my inexperience, and of the difficulties of a new and untried station, I am yet cheered by the hope that you will sustain me in my efforts to preserve the order of business and the decorum of debate. I am aware that party fervor is occasionally impatient of the restraint which it is the duty of the Chair to impose upon the asperities of debate, but at the same time I know that the just of all parties will sustain a Speaker who is honestly endeavoring to preserve the dignity of the House, and the harmony of its members.

Permit me, in conclusion, gentlemen, to tender you the homage of my heartfelt thanks for the honor which you have conferred upon me, and to express the hope that your counsels may be so guided by wisdom as to redound to your own reputation, and the welfare of our common country.

The journal of yesterday was then read, when

Mr. DROMGOOLE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved; That the standing rules and orders of the last House of Representatives be adopted as the rules and order of proceedings of this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved to lay this resolution on the table until the members were first sworn.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON referred to the law of 1789, to show that this resolution was inadmissible at the present time, that law declaring that the members shall take the oath of office before they proceed to business. He therefore made a point of order, as to whether this resolution could be entertained at the present time.

Mr. DROMGOOLE stated that he had moved this resolution with a view of avoiding all difficulty in case any question should arise in the course of administering the oath to the members. With regard to the law of 1789, he would ask where was its obligation when we were two weeks acting as members of the House of Representatives, and adopting rules for our government without having the oath first administered? He thought it was due to the House, and due to the Speaker, that rules of order should be adopted at the earliest possible period, in order that the business of the House might be conducted according to rules of order, usual in all deliberative bodies.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON would yie'd to the request of the gent'eman from Virginia, if he could conscientiously; but he held that the law in this case was imperative.

The SPEAKER suggested that the better way of deciding upon this question would be on the motion to lay on the tab'e.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then withdrew his question of order.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House. Lost.

Mr. GRAVES then called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table, which were ordered, and were—yeas 116, nays 116, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Ba nard, Bell, Biddle, Black, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Colquitt, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, King, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mercer, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Wise—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, De la Montanya, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lee, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsay, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steinrod, Strong, Sumter, Sweeny, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterston, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—116.

The SPEAKER voting in the affirmative, the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. CRAIG then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That every member of the House of Representatives of the United States ought, upon taking his seat therein, to produce at the CLERK's table, or to deposite in the CLERK's office, the credentials by virtue of which he claims his seat; and in all cases of contested elections, no member ought to be permitted to vote until the House, upon a report from the standing Committee of Elections, or by a vote of the majority of the members present, having a quorum of the House, shall have decided which of the claimants is entitled to the contested seat.

Mr. WISE said that there was the same objection to this resoluti n as to the other, and moved that it be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to.

The oath was then administered to the members from the several States, except New Jersey, Mr. RANDOLPH not presenting himself when New Jersey was called.

After the members from all the States except New Jersey were sworn,

Mr. RANDOLPH, together with the five members claiming seats under the Governor's certificate, presented themselves at the Clerk's table, and demanded to be sworn, but the SPEAKER refused to swear any of them except Mr. RANDOLPH.

The SPEAKER then stated that J. B. AYCRIGG, C. C. STRATTON, J. P. B. MAXWELL, W. HALSTED, and T. J. YORKE, had appeared while he was administering the oath of office to the members, and demanded to be sworn. Had this question occurred this morning de novo, and no proceeding of the House having been had upon it, he should not have hesitated in administering the oath to these gentlemen; but inasmuch as proceedings had been had heretofore in the House, and a decision made, or rather a negative proposition adopted, he felt it to be his duty to refuse to administer the oath to them, and to refer the matter to the House, to say whether they should be sworn.

Mr. WISE would inquire whether any member had objected to the swearing of these gentlemen.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he understood the CHAIR to state the difficulty, and then submit the metter to the House to decide whether the oath should be administered to these gentlemen.

Mr. WISE again asked whether any member objected to the swearing of these gentlemen, and if no objection was made, he presumed there would be no question but for the SPEAKER to swear them at once.

The SPEAKER then stated to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that he did not feel himself authorized to do this, from the fact that a resolution submitted by the gentleman himself had been negatived, and the vote upon it stood recorded on the journals of the House. By that resolution the House decided that these gentlemen were not entitled to take seats, and in consequence of that resolution, he thought it became him to submit this grave question to the decision of the House.

Mr. WISE expressed his approbation of the course of the CHAIR; but he submitted whether a resolution adopted by the Repre entatives of the people, or a part of them, while in an unorganized state, could have any binding effect upon this body at the present time. He therefore would move, in order to test this question, that these gentlemen be not sworn, if it was in order to make that motion. A sovereign State had been deprived of its representation simply by the form of putting the question, and he made the motion in this form in order that gentlemen might not deprive a State of her rights by the trickery of forms.

The SPEAKER requested that the gentleman should submit his proposition in writing.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said if he understood the question, the SPEAKER had submitted a question to the House for its decision, to wit: "Shall these five gentlemen be permitted to qualify?" This was an affirmative proposition, and must come up in that form, whatever effort his colleague might make to the contrary. The course taken by the CHAIR was not without precedent. Cases had occurred in the Senate of the United States, as well as in this House, where the presiding officer had referred matters to the House. In the present case, the SPEAKER had referred the matter to the House, and the House was in possession of the motion; and he demanded a decision upon that proposition.

Mr. MERCER contended that the present was a proper time to decide this question, and hoped the gentleman from Virginia would submit his proposition to the House.

Mr. WISE then submitted his resolution in writing, in substance as before stated. Mr. W. said his colleague would not forget, so soon after we had escaped from our chrysalis state and put on our wings, the charges of usurpation which had been made against the gentleman who occupied the Chair for temporary organization, because he presumed to put propositions to the House in his own form. The CHAIR, as he had understood him, had not put the question directly to the House, but had suggested that it would be a question for the decision of the House.

The CHAIR observed that he had, in the first instance, stated that the question, Shall the gentlemen from New Jersey be sworn, was a proper question for the House to decide upon; but gentlemen must not understand him as submitting that question to the House, but merely indicating the course which the House must pursue, unless some member submitted a proposition; and as the gentleman from Virginia had submitted such a proposition, the CHAIR would entertain the motion.

Mr. WISE said he had, then, not misunderstood the CHAIR, and in order to relieve the CHAIR from submitting this question to the House, he had submitted his resolution; and unless gentlemen desired to speak on the subject, he would move the previous question. He, however, withdrew it at the request of some gentlemen around him.

Mr FRANCIS THOMAS suggested the propriety of postponing the further consideration of this question, until the House should adopt rules of order. A resolution to adopt the rules of the last House for the government of this body, had been laid on the table by the casting vote of the SPEAKER; but the House was not then full, and it seemed to him, that as this question had been brought up, the House ought to have some rules for its guidance. He would put it to gentlemen to say, whether this question should not be postponed until rules were adopted for the government of the body.

Mr. WISE would have no objection to pursue the course indicated by the gentleman from Maryland, if it was not that difficulties might arise by the adoption of those rules before the members of the House were all sworn. The question may arise as to whether we shall vote viva voce or by ballot, or other questions might arise, all of which should be left untouched until all the members of the House were sworn. And with regard to rules for our government, he submitted whether the rules of common sense were not all sufficient, until the question with regard to the New Jersey members was decided.

Mr. TILLINGHAST contended that there were natural rules of order and natural precedents which it was impossible for the House to overlook; and these natural rules of order, he maintained, were all sufficient for the government of the body until this question was decided. He also referred to the case of Claiborne and Gholson at the extra session of 1837, to exhibit a precedent in that case applicable to the present case. Mr. T. then gave way to

Mr. WISE, who asked that the credentials presented by Messrs. AYCRIGG, MAXWELL, &c. be read; and the CLERK read them to the House.

Mr. TURNEY called for the reading of the credentials on the other side.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman had only called for the reading of the documents on one side.

Mr. TILLINGHAST continued his remarks, and contended that the resolution of Mr. WISE should be the first thing acted on.

Mr. SERGEANT heartily approved of the course adopted by the CHAIR, in referring the subject to the House for its consideration; but as to the mode in which it is to be presented, he did not understand the CHAIR to decide, but that he left it entirely to the House. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was right, under these circumstances, in offering a resolution which he considered to be in strict conformity to the spirit and provisions of the Constitution of the United States. The very first question which presents itself here is no less than this: If gentlemen present themselves here with regular credentials, offering to be sworn, are they to be excluded by less than a majority of the House? Did it not, in other words, require a majority to bring them in, or did it not require a majority to exclude them? Those who maintain that it requires a majority to bring them in, maintain what appeared to him to be unconstitutional doctrine, because it seemed that, to entitle a gentleman to be sworn, he must have something more than regular credentials of his State; that is, he must have the aid of a majority of this House. He considered the decision that was made by this House some days ago, to be of a very doubtful character, to say the least of it; nay, he could not say that decision was conformable to the Constitution, either in its terms or its spirit. Now, sir, (said Mr. S.) is this the law of the land? If there be a choice in the two modes of putting the question, is it not plainly within the spirit of the Constitution to give it that form and that direction which shall give to the voice of a sovereign State the greatest power? Or shall we

(said he) regard that voice as nothing, and insist upon it that those gentlemen cannot be introduced unless a majority of this House declared them entitled to come in. Let us see, said Mr. S. what we are called upon to decide, and what we are to decide. This was not yet a House of Representatives of the United States, he meant in its perfect and organized form; and for that reason he held the House of Representatives, in all its stages of existence, to mean a representation from all the States of the Union, in proportion to that allowed by the laws. The first provision of the Constitution relating to this subject is, that in every stage of the existence of the House, every State shall be represented—that no State shall stand unrepresented. If a State has not a sufficient population to entitle her to one Representative, according to the apportionment laws, yet she must, according to the Constitution, have one.

Mr. S. here referred to the third clause of the second section of the first article of the Constitution in support of his argument, as follows: "The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hamsphire shall be entitled to choose three; Massachusetts, eight; Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, one; Connecticut, five; New York, six; New Jersey, four; Pennsylvania, eight; Delaware, one; Maryland, six; Virginia, ten; North Carolina, five; South Carolina, five; and Georgia, three."

Now, (said Mr. S.) what do you purpose to do? Why, to constitute a Congress without a representation from the State of New Jersey, by members from the other States of this Union voting against them. The Constitution says that every State shall have a Representative here, and yet you have deprived a sovereign State of five-sixths of her representation. Under the Constitution and laws, as they now are, the State is not otherwise known than as an organic body, and we have no right, in the present stage of our proceedings, to look at the State of New Jersey but as an organic body—as an independent power coming here, demanding to take her share in the legislation of Congress. Has New Jersey failed to do her duty under the Constitution? It is admitted that she has done it; that she is here by her Representatives, who have been here from the beginning, claiming to be admitted. She has five-sixths of her Representatives here, who have been excluded. Can you constitute a Congress without them? The State having elected her Representatives, when they have been sent here, and offered to participate in the business of the nation, your excluding them affects all the States of the Union, New Jersey as well as the rest. Where is your authority for this? Mr. S. here went on to comment on the commissions presented by the five New Jersey claimants, and contended that they were regular, and such as bore on their face nothing to raise a doubt. No such question, he said, was ever raised in regard to Mr. Moore's credentials, and the Mississippi members. From the commissions themselves, no gentleman could find in them a single particular in which they were not in precise conformity with the laws of New Jersey. You could not have more conclusive evidence presented from New Jersey, or from any State, to show that these gentlemen were elected.

Mr. S. here went into a long argument of the constitutional question involved, and in answer to the doctrine of Mr. PICKENS, urging in contradiction to him, that the House of Representatives known to the Constitution, was a House in which all the States were fully represented; and contended that a representative holding the certificate was a member of Congress before he arrived here, and before he was qualified, as well as after he was qualified. Mr. S. continued his argument at great length in support of the gentlemen holding the certificates to take their seats, without examining the testimony or going to any extent behind the certificates.

Mr. DROMGOOLE replied at length to the argument of Mr. SERGEANT, presenting, in forcible and eloquent language, a conclusive and able refutation of the positions presented by that gentleman, a brief outline of which our limits will only permit us now to give. He had never, at any preliminary stage of the proceedings, he said, gone into the merits of this controversy, because he believed the discussion would be premature, and would have no other effect than to prejudge and forestall the opinions of the House and of the public, before the evidence was before them. His opinion had been, from the first, that they ought to go into an examination of this question by a committee, who should report the facts and evidence to the House, and that then both parties should be permitted to come in, and present their own case, "ore tenus," at the bar. But gentlemen on the other side wanted to jump over all inquiry, reject all evidence, and, restricting themselves to the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey, decide that those who held them should take their seats. They were called upon to decide that these commissions were conclusive as to the right of the gentlemen to take their seats, and could not by any evidence be controverted. Gentlemen had also urged the imperfect state of the organization of the House, as a reason why it could not go into an examination of all the evidence bearing on the case; but gentlemen could not now avail themselves of that difficulty. We are, said Mr. D. organized; we have a Speaker, we have taken the oath of office, and there is nothing to prevent us from entering into an examination of all the evidence, and of deciding it upon its merits. Though fully convinced that this power existed, yet he believed that it would be premature to exercise it until after a full examination into all the facts and evidence by a committee and a report upon it. Some of the propositions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] were so abhorrent to the principles of the Constitution, that he felt constrained to meet them at the threshold, though he would not now go into an examination of the merits of the main question. He understood the gentleman to say that he could only look at the State of New Jersey acting in its corporate, or organic capacity. Now he utterly denied that in this instance the doctrines of the gentleman were in accordance with the Constitution; and he would call upon him to look at that instrument itself, and see what authority it gave him for his assumptions. Before going into an examination of this part of the gentleman's argument, he would premise a few remarks, in order that they might arrive at a better understanding of the subject. It was known to the Speaker, who, from his infancy, had been taught in the political school of the State Rights party, that the term "State" is used in three different senses; and he would refer gentlemen to Mr Madison's celebrated report on the resolutions of John Taylor of Caroline in the Virginia Legislature, as authority for this understanding of the term. The term "State" sometimes meant the territory comprehended within its limits—as, said Mr. D. we may speak of going into Maryland or into Virginia. It sometimes meant the machinery by which the State Government was carried on; and again, it sometimes meant the whole people of the State, and then the term State was applied to it as a sovereign State alone. The term State, therefore, was sometimes applied to the territory; sometimes to the Government, and sometimes to the people, in their highest attribute of sovereignty. The State Governments, as such, Mr. D. said, are not parties to the Federal compact. The States of New Jersey, Virginia, and the rest, in their highest sovereign capacity, that is, the people of these States alone, are the parties. Do not tell me, then, said Mr. D. that we are opposed to State rights, when we contend that the machinery of a State shall not misrepresent the will of the sovereign people of the State. With this distinction, he would call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the language of the Constitution on this subject. "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year"—By whom, sir? By the States? No, sir: but "by the people of the several States." Then as to the Senate. The Constitution says that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislatures thereof," &c. And here, said Mr. D. is the distinction shown between the two bodies, and this is, what I have always contended it is, the popular body—this is the part of the Federal Government which obtains a popular feature. He saw his venerable colleague [alluding to Mr. MERCER] smile, for he fully concurred in these great doctrines of the State Rights party.

In looking at the returns of the New Jersey elections, even if we should go behind the great seal, we shall be guilty neither of a violation of the Constitution, nor of the rights of the State of New Jersey; but, on the contrary, in contending for the rights of the people to elect their Representatives, we are carrying out the Federal compact in the fullest extent. We inquire who the people of New Jersey have elected as their Representatives, and, in so doing, we regard that State in her highest sovereign capacity. He should like to know from his learned friend from Pennsylvania, or from any member of that body, learned or unlearned, where it is he finds any authority for the assumption that the House of Representatives could not go behind the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey, with the great seal of the State, in deciding upon the elections, returns and qualifications of its members. He denied that there was any authority for it, either in the Constitution or laws, or in precedents found in parliamentary practice. He contended that the word "returns," carried with it every question connected with the returns; and that they had as much right to inquire into the returns of the votes of Millville and South Amboy, which were suppressed by the clerks, as into the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey. If gentlemen doubted this, he would cite for them abundant authority. Mr. D. here referred to the case of Spalding and Mead, a contested case of election returns decided some years ago in the House of Representatives. In this case, under the laws of the State of Georgia, the votes were required to be returned within a limited time; but the votes of three counties not having been returned within that time, the Governor felt himself constrained not to count them, and to give the commission to Mead. The seat was contested, and it was decided here that the House was not restricted by the proclamation of the Governor, as is now contended, but that the "returns" comprehended all the votes given in that Congressional district, whether counted by the Governor or not. There were two points decided in that case, the primary returns and the ultimate returns; and therefore, the laws of New Jersey requiring the returns to be made by the county clerks to the Governor, who is to sum them all up, and to give the commissions in conformity with them, the House must inquire into all the facts of these elections, going back to the primary returns, to act in conformity with this precedent. The House decided against Mr. Spalding, and that the votes which were kept back, whether they were the result of fraud or otherwise, were still to be counted. Mr. D. would not here enter into any examination of the conduct of Governor Pennington. He would not pretend to say that Governor Pennington had done wrong. He would be willing to admit, and he would ground his argument on the position that the Governor could not have acted otherwise than he did—that he was obliged to give his commissions, without counting the Millville and South Amboy votes; but he would ask, could this House refuse to count them? There were at least forty cases in which it was decided that all the returns should be looked into, and upon the ground that this House was not violating the laws of the States, but carrying them out. It was perfectly competent for the House, looking into the returns, to examine them all—to compare them together, and decide whether these certificates of the Governor, with the broad seal, might not be impeached either for want of form or want of verity; and, if they were not in accordance with the laws of New Jersey, and not in accordance with the facts as regards summing up all the votes taken at the election, they were void, and might be set aside. He would be glad to know where gentlemen found the authority for the assumption that these commissions of the Governor of New Jersey were conclusive as to the right of those persons bringing them to take their seats without further question. Where was the precedent for it? All the decisions were directly at variance with it; and in the case of Spalding and Mead, it was decided that the returns were only prima facie evidence. But gentlemen contended that a prima facie evidence of a right gave a man a conclusive right. It was not worth while to go into a refutation of this absurdity. It must be admitted that the right to take a seat in that House rested on the elections and qualifications of the members, and that the prima facie evidence of these two circumstances was only good evidence in the absence of any thing to contradict it. The very learned gentleman from Pennsylvania attempted to prove that the five New Jersey gentlemen were now members of the House, and had been so for a long time. Now, he did not understand that there was any thing in the Constitution or the laws to justify him in this position. Did he understand the argument of the gentleman to be that, because these five New Jersey gentlemen, on their way here, might be discharged from arrest under color of their right as members of the House, this gave them a right? Where did the gentleman find that the decision of a judge, or even of the chief justice himself and all his associates, was authority to bind the House of Representatives, acting under the power given them by the Constitution? To a certain extent, these gentlemen, with the commissions of the Governor of New Jersey in their pockets, had the rights and privileges of members, while on their way to the seat of Government; but that gave them no right which they did not possess. Here Mr. D. quoted the case of Hammond, a member from Ohio, decided by the House of Representatives, in which the question was raised with regard to the time when membership commenced; and referred to the very able report made by Mr. John W. Taylor, of New York, in that case. There it was decided that membership, so far as this House was concerned, did not commence until the gentleman had actually taken his seat in it.

Mr. D. next entered into a refutation of Mr. SERGEANT'S position, that there never was any interregnum of the House of Representatives, but that it was a perpetual body. This he denied. One of the first distinctions he had ever learned between the two Houses, was, that the Senate was a perpetual body, but that the House ceased to exist with the expiration of the term for which its members were elected; and that at every Congress there was a new House of Representatives. He no more believed in the unbroken succession of the House of Representatives, than he did in the unbroken succession of the line of the Popes from St. Peter down to this time.

Mr. D. said he had shown before, that they were not to look to the body of the representatives of a State as the representation of the State itself, but to look at it, under the Constitution, as the representation of the people of that State. Gentlemen seemed to have great fears about going into conflict with the laws of a State; but, said Mr. D. there are decisions of this House, which, finding State laws standing in the way of the Constitution, have set them aside; and this is not going into conflict with the laws of that States, but merely passing them by, because they did not conform to the Constitution. Mr. D. quoted the case of Mr. Barney of Maryland, whose seat was contested, to show that the House set aside a law of the State of Maryland, requiring a qualification as to residence, which was not required by the Constitution; that instrument requiring only the member to be, when elected, an inhabitant of the State from which he is chosen. But gentlemen would perceive the absurdity to which they would be driven, by contending that the enactments of a State are binding on the House of Representatives, as to the elections and returns of its members. If, as gentlemen say, these certificates and seals are conclusive as to the right of those presenting them how could the House judge of such elections and returns, as it is solely empowered to do by the Constitution? If this doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in accordance with what he conceives to be the States Rights doctrines, it was a species of nullification, he apprehended, that his States Rights friends would not go for. The Nullification party, as he understood, (at the same time appealing to Mr. PICKENS,) interposed the State's sovereignty to arrest an unconstitutional law; but this nullifying the Constitution of the United States by a State enactment, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would now have it, was going further than any Nullifier he ever heard of was disposed to go. Thus much as to the rights of the States. He flattered himself that all the State Rights gentlemen were now with him.

But gentlemen asserted that some persons must take their seats as members from the State of New Jersey before the House can decide the matter. "I should like" (said Mr. D.) "for gentlemen to show me their authority for this. I should like to know when it was decided that a member must take his seat before it can be decided whether he is entitled to it." Mr. D. here referred to the decision in the case of Mr. Edwards of Maryland, to show the error of this position; and also, for the same purpose, referred to the case of Mr. John Richards, a member from the State of Pennsylvania, in which case the Governor of that State acted with much more delicacy and moderation than the Governor of New Jersey; for he gave the commission to neither of the contending parties, but left the controversy to be decided by the House. Now in this New Jersey case the refusal of the Governor to give his certificates would not, in the least, have prejudiced the claims of those gentlemen to whom he did give them; for they would still have had the same rights which they now possessed, and on which only the House was competent to decide. This book, [holding up the volume of contested election cases,] said Mr. D. is full of cases in which the House has counted the votes, either where the authorities of the States refused to count them, or where they were returned too late to be counted under the State laws. He would not undertake here to define what was meant by the phrase "prima facie evidence;" but he was grossly deceived if it meant any thing more than first blush evidence, and became good only in the absence of testimony to controvert it. You cannot, then, said Mr. D. where there is clear, strong and impartial testimony staring you in the face, impeaching this prima facie evidence, conclude that you will not give it a hearing, without violating every principle of justice, as well as of the Constitution of the United States.

After having shown the power of the House to examine into all the returns of its members, both primary and ultimate, Mr. D. would merely say that if the certificates of the Secretary of State are not evidence in this case, it was twice decided in the House, in the case of Spalding and Mead that they were; and further, that this was the first time that the certificate and seal of an office of record was not considered good evidence with regard to the records in that office. He had briefly touched on the points involved in this case, for the purpose of showing that the House ought not to resolve with this inconsiderate, he would not say indecent, haste, that they would not look into the important testimony impeaching those certificates, but ought to make up its decision after a full knowledge of all the evidence belonging to this case. He, Mr. D. was for going regularly into an examination of this case, and for going into it in a tangible form. He was for permitting both parties to be heard on their trial. Believing this to be the course required as well by expediency as by justice, he would not, even if he thought these five New Jersey gentlemen had the right to the returns, vote for the proposition of his colleague; for it would not be right nor just to prejudge the case before ascertaining all the facts connected with it. He hoped, therefore, that it would be the pleasure of the House to have the whole case fairly brought before them, and then, after hearing both parties, discuss it calmly and deliberately, and decide upon it with a full understanding of its merits. Mr. D. said that he was for going into an examination of this question through the medium of a committee, both for the sake of convenience, and for the sake of bringing all the evidence more clearly within the view of the members of that body. This would be in conformity with the precedent established in the case of Moore and Letcher, where it was solemnly decided that, pending the controversy, neither party should be permitted to qualify. He believed there was not a single exception in cases decided in either branch of Congress, where gentlemen presenting themselves, and whose credentials were objected to, in which the matter was not referred to a committee, who reported before there was any further action upon it. The book was full of such cases, and gentlemen, with all their ingenuity, could not find a single case in which a contrary course was taken. He found cases where the Governors of States had commissioned members, and where they were not permitted to qualify, but were sent with their credentials to a committee. Where no question with regard to the credentials was raised, the member presenting them was always permitted to qualify, of course; but whenever the question was raised to the validity of their commission, they were not suffered to qualify until it was decided that they were entitled to their seats. Mr. D. in this part of his argument, read the case of Mr. Landon, in the Senate of the United States in March, 1825, by which it appeared that Mr. L's credentials having been objected to, he was not permitted to qualify, but the matter was referred to a committee.

Mr. WISE. What were the objections to Mr. Landon's credentials?

Mr. DROMGOOLE. Not that they were informal—not that they were not signed by the Governor, accompanied by the broad seal of a sovereign State, but that the Governor had no right to give them. In the case of Mr. Landon, there was a proposition that he should be permitted to take the oath, and it was rejected, and his credentials were referred to a committee. There was, also, a long list of precedents to the same purport, which he would not take up the time of the House by reading, though he would cite one of the cases to show that, where the objection was raised as to the credentials, the House went into an examination of them through the agency of a committee. [Mr. D. here read a case of a member from the State of Ohio, in which this course was taken by the House.] In all cases where no objections were raised to the credentials, the member was permitted to qualify; but in every case in which objections had been made to them, they were not permitted to take their seats till the validity of their credentials was decided on.

If the doctrines for which gentlemen contend, that these certificates, no matter how obtained, will give a seat in this House, should prevail, you will strike a fatal blow at the freedom of elections and the purity of a representative Government? It is this elective franchise, Mr. D. said, and the belief of the people that they may, through it, of right, carry out the Democratic principle, and do what they cannot do but in their primary assemblies, that is the surest safeguard of our liberties. But, said Mr. D. if you establish the principle that the credentials given by the State authorities, no matter how fraudulent—no matter how much at variance with the will of the people of the State, as expressed in the elections, shall outweigh the popular voice, you strike a stab at the existence of the elective franchise, and destroy every principle that makes Democracy both lovely and practicable.

Mr. D. in conclusion, denied that excluding the New Jersey members till their credentials were inquired into, would be disfranchising that State. If her members presented themselves with credentials, which there was good reason to doubt the validity of, it was her misfortune, and the fault of her authorities; but the House was nevertheless bound to exercise the power vested in it by the Constitution, and to examine into all the evidence connected with them. If you decide, said Mr. D. that we must, ex necessitate rei, permit these gentlemen to take their seats here, and, through their agency, laws may be passed detrimental to the rest of the Union, and then afterwards, upon an investigation, decide that they are not entitled to their seats, I ask, said he, how you are to repair the injury thus inflicted. He asked if it would not be the part of wisdom, as well as of safety, to let these gentlemen wait until, after a fair, calm, and impartial examination, the House could decide upon their claims. He indulged the hope that, if the House was disposed to do justice to New Jersey, as well as to the rest of the Union, they would not decide upon this matter with such inconsiderate haste as to overlook the important testimony before them.

Mr. CHAPMAN rose to make a privileged motion. He desired to move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution for the adoption of rules of order was laid on the table this morning.

The CHAIR said the motion could not be made unless a motion was made to postpone the question before the House.

Mr. RHETT inquired of the CHAIR whether he considered the House bound by any general parliamentary principles, it having refused to adopt the rules of the last House of Representatives this morning.

The SPEAKER said his impression was, that the House was bound by general parliamentary principles.

Mr. RHETT then said, that if the general parliamentary law was obligatory on the House, this proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, in regard to the New Jersey members, was clearly out of order; for according to all parliamentary law, you cannot introduce a proposition which has been once rejected. The rule laid down in Jefferson's Manual was, when a proposition is once rejected, no question of a similar character can be brought before the House. Now this question, with regard to the right of the New Jersey members to take their seats, had been decided by the House, not only once, but more than once, for he maintained that this body was as much a House when it decided this question, as it was at the present time, or as it ever could be. By the Constitution of the United States, as well as by the parliamentary rule, the House was as much a House before the election of a Speaker as after it, and he presumed no gentleman would contend that the election of a Speaker would make a House. He referred to a case in the British Parliament, where it was fourteen days without a Speaker, yet no one pretended that it was incompetent to pass upon questions which might be presented to it during that time. If gentlemen would refer to the proceedings of the Parliament of Great Britain, they would see where that body had decided questions again and again without a Speaker. A Speaker might be necessary in conducting the business of the House, but the want of a Speaker took nothing from the power of the House. Sir, what have we done already? Did not the House, at the instance of a gentleman from Virginia, adopt rules for the government of its proceedings? Well, were we a House then, or were we not? Did we not perform other duties? And were we a House, or were we not, when we performed those duties? Will men pretend to say that we had not the power to perform these duties until you were placed in that chair? The Constitution of the United States says that each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings. Well, sir, is the journal of the last two weeks, which is lying upon your table, the journal of the House of Representatives, or is it not? Unquestionably, gentlemen will not deny that it is the journal of the House. Again the Constitution says that the House shall judge of the qualifications, election, and returns of its members. Well, has not the House decided on the qualifications and returns of the New Jersey members? for unquestionably it was a House when it made this decision. The Constitution further says that the House shall elect a Speaker. Were we a House when you were elected, or were we not. He contended that the House had the right to decide on the qualification and returns of its members before the election of a Speaker; and further, that the House did right in deciding upon the New Jersey case before a Speaker was called to the chair. The House had decided the question, and it had decided against the right of the New Jersey members taking their seats, and although he had no instrumentality in making that decision, he held that the House, having once made such a decision, it was not competent for it to open up the question again, and he would sustain that course of proceeding which would put an end to the question at the earliest possible period. It seemed to him that it was due to the country that we should proceed now with the public business, which had already been too long delayed. There was business of greater importance to be performed than discussing this question day after day. The President of the United States was waiting to send in his Message; gentlemen of all parties were looking for it; and the whole people of the country are desirous that we should proceed at once to the discharge of the duties which devolve upon us, their Representatives.

Mr. BRIGGS referred to the resolution which had been submitted by Mr. RHETT in the first instance, and to the discussion which was had upon it. While it was under debate, the gentleman from South Carolina had been asked, whether he intended by it to preclude all examination of the New Jersey case, after the election of a Speaker; and the gentleman had then said it was not his intention to preclude examination of the question, after the organization, yet he now says that the question has been finally and absolutely settled.

Mr. RHETT rose to explain. What he said now was, that you could not introduce the same proposition now which had been decided before, because the resolution now before the House was identically the same proposition which had been decided before.

Mr. BRIGGS contended that the House had the right to decide upon the question as it was now brought up, and that the former decision of the body, in its unorganized state, would not conflict with this resolution. He replied to the argument of Mr. DROMGOOLE, and asserted that there was not to be found, within the last fifty years, a single case, either in the Congress of the United States or in the State Legislatures, where a member, regularly returned according to law, had been refused his seat in the first instance.

Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania rose and stated, that at the last session of the Pennsylvania Legislature, two gentlemen from the eighth Senatorial district of Pennsylvania, had presented their credentials to the Senate of that State, made out in pursuance of the laws of the State, yet they were not permitted to take their seats, and their opponents, who had no credentials at all, had the seats given to them.

Mr. RIVES of Va. also referred to cases in the Virginia Legislature, where the persons holding the certificates were not permitted to take their seats.

Mr. BRIGGS resumed his remarks, referring to the book of contested elections, and declaring that there was no precedent in the sixty-six cases there laid down, where a member having the legal certificate was prevented from taking his seat.

Mr. DROMGOOLE admitted that members were permitted to take their seats upon the evidence they produce, if no question is raised as to their right to their seats; but he maintained that where the question of right was raised, the House must decide it before qualification. In support of this position, he referred to the cases of Edwards, Richards, and Moore and Letcher.

Mr. BARNARD obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform the Senate—

1. Whether duties have been exacted of any vessels of the United States employed in the whale fishery, for tonnage, or the produce of such fisheries, and if so, under what authority.

2. What papers were furnished to such vessels before they cleared, and were they such as have at all times been granted to vessels thus employed.

3. What amount of duties and charges have been paid, what amount bonded, and are the bonds now in force, and unpaid.

4. Are duties now exacted of all such vessels as they arrive, and what amount of fees, if any, have accrued to officers of the customs from this source, and at what places.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Senate that the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is indisputable, and never will be abandoned.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to give notice to the British Government that the conventions of 1818, and 1827, which give the right to use and occupy the Oregon Territory, its bays, rivers, harbors, &c. to both parties indiscriminately, shall cease in twelve months after such notification.

Resolved, That it is both expedient and proper to extend such portions of the laws of the United States over the Territory of Oregon, as may be necessary to secure the lives, liberty, and property of our citizens who may reside in said Territory.

Resolved, That it is expedient to raise an additional regiment of infantry, (rifles,) for the purpose of overawing and keeping in check various Indian tribes, or any foreign forces, who may be in said Territory, or on its borders; and at the same time to give ample protection to our citizens engaged in legitimate occupations.

Resolved, That six hundred and forty acres of land should be granted to every white male inhabitant of said Territory of the age of eighteen years, who shall cultivate and use the same five consecutive years, and to his heirs at law in the event of his death.

Mr. PRENTISS gave notice that, at as early a day as it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners to hear and determine claims against the United States.

Mr. HUBBARD gave notice that, as soon as it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay.

A bill for the relief of Samuel White.

A bill for the relief of John Burke.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, December 18, 1839.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of this House is assembled, that R. M. T. HUNTER, one of the Representatives from the State of Virginia, has been elected Speaker thereof; and that it is now ready to proceed to business, and that the acting Clerk do go with said message.

Mr. WISE and Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina objected to its reception, because the gentleman from New York was entitled to the floor on another subject.

Mr. JOHNSON said his only object was that the House might be enabled to proceed to business at the earliest possible period.

The objections were not withdrawn, and the CHAIR decided that the gentleman from New York was entitled to the floor on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question pending was the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. WISE, that Messrs. AYCRIGG, HALSTED, MAXWELL, STRATTON, and YORKE, are not entitled to be sworn as members of the House.

Mr. BARNARD, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at great length on the subject of the resolution. The simple question was, whether the members from New Jersey, who were here in their seats, should be sworn, and it was thus he understood the proposition as a simple question; and simple as it was, it involved many and serious and important considerations, affecting not merely the triumph of party, but affecting the integrity of the Constitution itself, and the laws, and in its consequences the very Government under which we live. When, a few days ago, he had the honor to make some remarks on the que-tion then presented, growing out of the contest, he offered to the consideration of the gentlemen around him two distinct grounds as to what was then properly before them. The first was, that, in the condition of the House as then constituted, no question whatever was presented for its consideration upon the elections of the members from New Jersey. The returns were perfect as returns; they were not impeached; they were unquestioned by any member upon this floor. The other was that in regard to matter of right. The question of election, as to which were ultimately entitled, could not come up then, because they had no right or power to decide upon it; it belonged to the Committee of Elections, after they were qualified as members, and the House constitutionally and properly organized.

The only point which the House could now undertake to decide, was upon the returns of these members as returns, and as to the matter of ultimate rights, and as to the election in New Jersey, that was a matter to be decided by evidence, and that could only be done by the House, when organized to decide as a judicial body. The word return was a word of legal and parliamentary import; and he contended when a return was made in the legal and constitutional manner, the person having the return was entitled to his seat, and could not properly be prevented from taking it. The return was a member's title to office, and he was as much entitled to his seat under it, as any person was entitled to office under his commission.

Mr. B. went into an examination of the law of Parliament, and the practice under it in Great Britain, and in this country, to show that these members were legally entitled to their seats, and contended that this House could not prevent them from taking their seats, until it decided that their opponents was entitled to seats. If the one set of members were rejected, most certainly the other set must be admitted, because the State of New Jersey could not be deprived of her representation. He trusted that the House would not now set the precedent of excluding members who had the regular returns; for if this precedent was once set, it might lead to consequences the most fearful. If the House once decided that a member having the legal return might be deprived of his seat, because there were others claiming, a reckless party might at any time deprive a large majority of the members of the House from taking their seats, by getting persons to come on here, and contest their rights to seats; and he asked what would be the state of affairs, if both parties should resort to this kind of proceeding at the same time. There could not be a doubt as to the right of the members having the regular return to take their seats, and no power had the right to deprive them of this.

Mr. RAYNER followed Mr. B. and after a brief exordium, entered into a history of the question involved, from the commencement of the session until the present time, attributing all the difficulties which were in the way of an organization of the House, to party excitement, and party discipline. He contended that the gentlemen who came here claiming seats as members from New Jersey, in opposition to those who were regularly, as he contended, commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey, had no more right here than had the fishwomen of Paris, who intruded themselves into the National Assembly in the time of the French Revolution. He contended that the party with which he acted were the only supporters of the Constitution and laws, as far as this question was concerned, and that they had been striving from the first to organize the House, and proceed to the despatch of the public business, while all the delay and disorder that had been witnessed, were the consequences of the opposition of the other party to the admission of the members who were regularly commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey. In arguing on the rights of these five New Jersey gentlemen to take their seats, he contended that the House had by no means the right to go behind their returns; and that these, emanating from the authorities of a sovereign State, were conclusive and binding on the House, and could not be controverted. Mr. R. paid a high compliment to the common law of England, which he considered the sacred fountain from which all our free institutions flowed; and, arguing that the principles of the common law sanctioned the claims of those gentlemen, he contended that, in the absence of any usage in this country to the contrary, these gentlemen ought to be permitted to take their seats without further question. Mr. R. entered into a long argument to show the necessity of adhering to the forms and technicalities of law, and replied at length to those gentlemen who attempted to cast ridicule on those technical forms which he deemed so essential. Such arguments, he thought, might be very useful when it was intended to delude the ignorant and honest people at the hustings, but were unworthy of this enlightened body, to which they had been addressed. The confusion and inconvenience of refusing to allow those members to take their seats who came here with the regular commissions of the Governor of their State, had been forcibly depicted in the beginning by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] and he considered the course taken by the majority of this House, to be an attempt to establish a precedent, which, if followed up, would, in after times, place a majority of this House in the power of a lean minority. Suppose, hereafter, he said, that parties should be so equally balanced in this House, that it required but a small addition to one side to overpower the other. In that case, one of the parties, following up the precedent now attempted to be established, might contest seats enough to give them the majority. There were men, however, in this country, who would never submit to such a daring usurpation of their rights, but would expend their life's blood in maintaining them. Establish this precedent, Mr. R. said, and the time will come when a member coming to take his seat here, must march up to the table with his credentials in one hand, and his dagger in the other. He spoke not this in a spirit of bravado, but was merely supposing the necessity to which a man might be driven, who knows his rights and dares maintain them. Gentlemen said that the fraud involved in these returns was so manifest, that it was absolutely necessary to go behind them. But, he said, if there was fraud you cannot remedy it, for you are not a tribunal competent to try it. The jury was not empannelled; the evidence was not before it, and the case was not ready for trial. Mr. R. further contended that if there was a fraud practised on the people of New Jersey, it was a fraud which the House was not now empowered to try. But he would ask gentlemen how they arrived at the conclusion that there was a fraud practised? Did they arrive at that conclusion from the evidence of scurrilous newspapers? He thought that those gentlemen who had thus prejudged the case should be estopped from hereafter sitting on the trial of it; and that justice, as well as delicacy, should prevent them from trying a cause which they had already decided.

Mr. VANDERPOEL observed that the debate, for the last day or two, had been so much on one side, that no opportunity had been allowed of saying any thing on the other side. If he thought that its protraction would make a single convert, he would be willing to sit here for a week; but every gentleman had made up his mind on one side or the other, and he did not believe that any one would change his opinions, were they to sit here till doomsday. He would, therefore, move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WISE inquired whether the motion was in order.

The SPEAKER said that it was.

Mr. SHEPARD of North Carolina asked the gentleman from New York to withdraw his motion, in order to allow him an opportunity of making a brief explanation.

Mr. GRAVES and Mr. WISE protested against the right of a gentleman who had the floor to make any such contracts. If the gentleman from New York yielded the floor to another member, he should have no right to claim it again when that member was done with his remarks.

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired of the CHAIR if it had not been the general usage and rule of the House for a member who had the floor to yield it to another who had asked leave to make an explanation, and to take it again when that explanation had been made?

The SPEAKER answered that such had been the practice of the House; but he did not understand that there was any parliamentary law on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland said that where an objection was made to a member retaining the floor, after having yielded it for the purpose of an explanation, it had been decided against him, and cited a decision of Mr. Speaker Polk on that point.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then said that he did not yield the floor.

Mr. WISE here rose to a point of order, and Mr. VANDERPOEL sat down. The law of 1789, he said, required that, before proceeding to business, all the members of the House must be sworn. The CHAIR had said that he would submit the question to the House for its decision, whether the members claiming to take seats as members from New Jersey should be permitted to qualify; and he had offered a resolution, in the negative form, that they should not be permitted to qualify. Now, he would ask of the CHAIR what would be the question if this resolution of his should be laid on the table? Would the question again arise, Shall these gentlemen be sworn?

The SPEAKER replied that the resolution now before the House being of a negative character, the question would naturally arise, "Shall these gentlemen be sworn?" if that resolution should be laid on the table.

Mr. McKAY referred to a case decided by Mr. Speaker Barbour, in which the question was raised whether a certain gentleman was entitled to his seat, and that question having been laid on the table, the decision was, that the rejection of a resolution in a negative form was equivalent to a decision in the affirmative. An appeal was taken, and the House reversed the decision.

Mr. ADAMS asked if a motion to lay on the table was debatable. There were no rules now binding on the House, and he did not understand that the parliamentary law prohibited debate on such motions.

The SPEAKER gave it as his opinion that the motion was not debatable.

Mr. BELL was of the same opinion with the gentleman from Massachusetts. By the common parliamentary law, motions to lay on the table were as much debatable as any other motion; and the rule that prohibited debate on them was an arbitrary one, which did not now prevail. He hoped the CHAIR would review his decision, as several gentlemen wished to speak on the question, who had not hitherto participated in the debate.

Mr. WISE asked if he had the right to withdraw his resolution at any time?

The SPEAKER replying in the affirmative,

Mr. WISE said he would give notice to gentlemen that if this motion was persisted in, he would withdraw his resolution and renew it in some other form. Gentlemen would perceive, therefore, that they could not get rid of this question, for he could present it in some new form as often as he pleased.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked if he understood the CHAIR correctly, in saying that the rejection of this resolution in a negative form, would be regarded by the CHAIR as a mandate to swear these gentlemen.

The SPEAKER made a few remarks in reply, which were very imperfectly heard by the Reporter; but he was understood to say that he would regard the rejection of the resolution as equivalent to an affirmative decision, that these gentlemen should be sworn.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then said, that after such an intimation by the CHAIR, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. WISE, who had the floor, said that he did not wish to proceed this evening with his remarks, and he would therefore, with the permission of the House, yield the floor to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SHEPARD,] to enable him to make an explanation, with the understanding that he had the right to it the first thing in the morning.

Mr. SHEPARD of North Carolina observed, that this debate had been extended for two weeks, and though he did not believe that he could throw any light on a subject on which the best talents had been employed in the course of the debate, yet as the course which he had thought it his duty to take had been somewhat different from that expected by most gentlemen, he deemed it but justice to himself to make a brief explanation of it. When we assembled here, said Mr. S. some weeks ago, certain gentlemen from the State of New Jersey appeared with certificates that they had been elected as Representatives from that State, similar to the one which I possess; and on referring to the laws of New Jersey, I found that the Governor of that State was authorized to receive from the judges of the elections the returns of all the votes given, to count them up, and to give commissions to those persons who received a majority of the votes. Sir, said Mr. S. these gentlemen who claim to be admitted to their seats here, have the certificates of the Governor, stating that they were duly elected; and it seemed to him they were entitled to take their seats, and to participate in the organization of the House by the election of a Speaker. It seemed to him, then, said Mr. S. that he had no more right to refuse to associate with them as members of this House, and to impeach the validity of their credentials, than they had to refuse to associate with him, and to impeach the validity of his. The Governor of New Jersey is the officer charged with making of the returns of election, and though not appointed by the Federal Government, his statements of the returns are as binding as if he acted under our authority. The commissions which he gave were in conformity with the usage which had always prevailed in this country, and in the country from which our institutions were derived; and in both countries the act of the returning officer was always considered valid and binding until proved by good and sufficient testimony to be wrong or fraudulent. This was the view which he took at the first, and which he took now. He would not go into an argument to show the truth of this position, for it had been already so ably argued that he had too much respect for the House to consume their time with repeating arguments that had been so often used. But some gentlemen contended that fraud had been committed in giving these returns. Admit that this were the fact; yet it seemed to him that they had no right, according to parliamentary law and usage, to inquire into it at that time. The gentlemen whose seats were contested had as much right, as he believed, to inquire whether fraud had been committed with regard to his credentials, as he had to inquire with regard to theirs. Indeed fraud might be committed on all hands. The certificates of the Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey, contesting the verity of these returns, might themselves be the result of fraud; and, therefore, in the preliminary stage of their proceedings, he thought they could not go into an examination of them. These reasons, and many others, which he would not trouble the House with reciting, induced him to give his votes in favor of the right of these gentlemen to take their seats. He thought they were entitled to have their names on the roll, and he therefore voted for the first proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] which was lost. Another resolution was offered by the same gentleman, affirming that they were entitled to take their seats, and leaving the question of ultimate right to be decided by the House, after it was organized. For this resolution he also voted. On Saturday last, the gentleman from Virginia introduced his third resolution on the subject; and on the motion to lay it on the table, he voted in the affirmative; and he had now risen more for the purpose of explaining his vote on that occasion, than to enter into an argument on the present question. When the motion to which he had referred was made, it seemed to him that they had already consumed too much time on the various questions connected with the subject, and that no good could result from keeping it any longer before the House. He thought it was time to lay aside this vexed question, and proceed at once to the organization of the House, and to the despatch of the public business. There was, therefore, no inconsistency in the two votes he had thus given. He voted according to the dictates of his best judgment, and subsequent reflection had convinced him that he had acted correctly. It seemed to him that the question had been settled by the preliminary meeting, that these gentlemen should not take their seats, and participate in the organization of the House, and that it would therefore be better to leave the controversy to be decided in the ordinary way by the House, upon its merits, after the action of the Committee of Elections, He must take this occasion to say that he had voted for the two resolutions of the gentleman from Virginia, with the greatest reluctance. In what he was about to say, he begged to be understood as not wishing or intending to impeach the motives of the gentlemen from New Jersey, who came here with the Governor's certificates; nor did he wish to impeach the conduct of the Governor himself. But he must say, that when he heard the evidence read at the Clerk's table, impeaching the validity of these returns, in which it was conclusively shown that the gentlemen who contested the seats had received a majority of the votes given at the elections—when he heard the evidence read that the clerks of two counties, Millville and South Amboy, had suppressed the vote given at these counties, and when he heard the evidence that the Governor himself admitted both these important facts, and, regretting that the technicalities of law prevented him from giving the returns to those who had received a majority of the votes, consoled himself with the belief that the House would do justice to all parties—when he had seen a proposal made last summer in the public papers, by the gentleman commissioned by the Governor, to throw up their commissions, and go again into a new election, thus admitting a doubt of their own rights, he could not avoid entertaining the suspicion that gross fraud had been practised. It seemed to him, Mr. S. said, that throughout the whole contest here, one party had made use of the forms and technicalities of law to cover up a mean and despicable fraud, while the other party had attempted to break down all the forms of law, in order to attain abstract justice; and being a law-loving and law-abiding man, he had voted to preserve the laws, though injustice might be the consequence. These things, Mr. S. said, were not uncommon in private life. A man often held possession of a tract of land to which he was not justly entitled, and which the law would take from him upon a legal investigation and trial of his title; but the forms of law must be preserved, and the tenant in possession must retain the land until the courts decide that another has a better title to it. He would pass over other matters, (Mr. S. said,) and come down to the proceedings of yesterday; and he confessed he never was more surprised in his life than he was when, shortly after the Speaker had taken the chair, and after his administering the oath to the members of the House, he saw these five New Jersey gentlemen walk up to the table and ask to be sworn. He did not, as he said before, mean to impeach their motives; they had a right to take their own course; but he thought that motives of delicacy, as well as of expediency, should have induced them to wait for the regular action of the House. Now, did not every man see that the contest has, all along, been for the purpose of electing a Speaker, and that these gentlemen and their friends were contending for their right to participate in that election? But (said Mr. S.) the right has been violated by decisions of the House again and again, and it is too late to rectify it. The House has been organized, and the Speaker has been elected, without the participation of these gentlemen, and they can, therefore, have no good reason for insisting on taking their seats without an investigation into their right to hold them. You, sir, [addressing the SPEAKER] have been elected as an impartial man; you and I voted to give these gentlemen their seats in the first instance, and you will doubtless deal justly and impartially in your appointment of a Committee of Elections. Then why not let this question of right be referred to that committee to be investigated on its merits, in order that the House, with a full knowledge of all the evidence connected with it, may decide on it camly, justly, and impartially. No injury or inconvenience would result to these gentlemen or their party by the delay. No great question would probably come before the House, in which their votes might be necessary before the decision of the House on their case. He, for one, would agree that all the great questions which were expected to come before them, should be postponed until that decision was made; yes, sir, said Mr. S. the great financial question, on which I shall go with the Executive, and the fate of which will probably depend on the decision of these contested election cases, may be laid over until the House shall decide who shall take their seats as Representatives from the State of New Jersey. He had merely risen, Mr. S. said, to explain the course he had taken. If any harm has been done by preventing these gentlemen from participating in the election of a Speaker, it is too late now to apply the remedy. The act has been done, and done forever, and let the country and posterity judge of its correctness. A great deal had been said about the States Rights doctrines that were involved in this question. Sir, said Mr. S. the question has as much to do with States Rights as it has with the Egyptian hieroglyphics. No man wishes to disfranchise the State of New Jersey. The only question is, who shall take their seats as members from that State? There was no intention of depriving any one of his rights; on the contrary, the sending this matter to a committeee, and bringing it to a thorough investigation upon its merits, was the surest way of doing justice to all. The argument had been used in the preliminary stage of the proceedings, that the House, in an imperfect state, and without a Speaker, could not enter into an examination of the evidence connected with the subject, nor try it on its merits. That difficulty was now removed. The House was now organized—a Speaker was elected, and the members were sworn. He hoped, therefore, there being no longer any obstacle in the way, that the House would take this course.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina here took the floor, and replied at length to Mr. DROMGOOLE, citing various precedents to show that the gentlemen who presented themselves with the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, were entitled to take their seats without further question; and that the House had no right to go behind these returns, or, at this stage of its proceedings, to go into an examination of the testimony contesting their validity.

Mr. WISE obtained the floor and moved an adjournment.

Mr. SHEPARD asked that the gentleman would withdraw the motion, so that he might have an opportunity of saying a few words in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WISE could not withdraw the motion unless it was understood that he should have the floor afterwards.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the House would permit the gentleman from North Carolina to make an explanation.

Mr. WISE then withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SHEPARD then said that he had been a humble member of the House of Representatives for the last two years, and in his course on that floor he had endeavored to be actuated by what he believed to be his duty to himself and the people he represented. He knew that, on various occastons, he had taken a course unpalatable to some gentlemen, and they had shown their disapprobation of that course by various circumstances and means. He would, however, now say to them, that he was not responsible to them, or to any body else, except the people who sent him there, and the country at large; and he hoped that, in the discharge of his duty in that House, he was as far from fear as any other member on the floor. He would neither yield to flattery on the one side, nor to bullying on the other. When he rose a few moments ago, he did not rise to make an apology for his vote—he owed no apology to any body; but he rose to put himself right before his constituents and the country at large, because he knew that the party organs, which were spread throughout the country, were always disposed to hold up a public man to odium. The people do not understand the rules of order in this House; and when gentlemen act differently from the views of partisans, it is easy for them to be misrepresented. And notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, he felt satisfied with the propriety of his course, and he believed that every person, untrammelled by party prejudice, would justify his conduct. He would now briefly state what he had said. He had said that when we first met in this House, he believed that those members from New Jersey who had the Governor's certificates were entitled to take their seats and participate in the election of a Speaker; but he stated further, that he had strong suspicion that those men had come here through a fraud. The gentleman from South Carolina himself had strong suspicion that they came here through a fraud, if he had not misunderstood him on another occasion. He thought in the first place that they had the right to participate in the election of a Speaker. They however were deprived of that right by the House, and they did not vote for a Speaker. Then, so far as the principle was concerned, it was violated by prohibiting them from voting in the election of a Speaker; and if they had at any time a right to participate in the organization of the House, that right had been trampled upon, and it was gone forever. Then, after all this was done, was it not the proper course, as a Speaker had been elected who would immediately appoint committees, to let the whole matter be brought up before a committee, and be examined, and properly decided? Last week, the argument was, that we must give faith and effect to the certificate, because the House was not organized, because there was no Speaker, no committee to examine, and collate facts. Now, sir, the case is different. You have been elected by the gentleman and his friends, because of your justice and impartiality. You can immediately appoint a committee, that will investigate the whole matter—that will bring to light the dark parts of this transaction, and do equal and full justice to all. Let the House take up the subject, and decide upon the whole question of right, now that these men have been deprived of taking seats in the first instance. Was there any inconsistency in his wishing to pursue this course? Would the gentleman from South Carolina desire to give men seats here who, upon examination, in a few days, it might be found, were not entitled to them? This was his position, and these were his views, expressed with all due respect to the great legal talents of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Sir, said Mr. S. the gentleman from South Carolina, in the conclusion of his remarks, had said that his relations with me were not such as would permit him to speak of me as he would of his honorable colleague. Although, sir, I do not fear that gentleman's lance, in any contest, I know that he is possessed of talents far superior to mine The gentleman seemed to know that he is much my superior in age, in learning, and in eloquence, but why did he not think of this before he commenced his attack? Why did he not attack his friend from South Carolina, who had voted with me on all these questions? That would have been more consistent with the gentleman's vaunted chivalry, which he is eternally talking about. [Laughter.] But the gentleman further says, that I had held that these men had a constitutional right to participate in the organization of the House, and contends that because they once had a constitutional right, I act inconsistently in not supporting their admission to seats at the present moment. In this matter, the gentleman himself is in no enviable position. The gentleman came into this House a Nullifier, opposed to a National Bank and a high tariff; still we find him always acting with that very party which goes for a National Bank, for a high tariff, and for all those measures which he has declared to be most odious to him. If it is inconsistent in me to pursue the course I have, is it not doubly inconsistent in the gentleman to pursue the course which he pursues? If I am inconsistent, he is still more so; and how can he justify himself to his constituents? How is it that he is struggling to get that party in power which would adopt all those Federal measures which he himself pretends to be absolutely opposed to?

In pursuing the course which I desire to pursue, I do not see that any harm can be done to any party, for I will be willing to postpone all the great questions which this House has to act upon, until the matter of this New Jersey election is finally decided upon, which can be done in a short time, as the House can proceed to it at once, and act upon it in a legal and constitutional manner.

Mr. THOMPSON said a few words in reply to Mr. SHEPARD, when

Mr TURNEY obtained the floor, and moved to refer this resolution, together with the credentials, and all other evidence in regard to the New Jersey elections, to the Committee of Elections, and on that motion moved the previous question.

On motion of Mr. WISE,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, December 19, 1839.

Mr. PRESTON appeared in his seat this morning.

Mr. NORVELL gave notice that, at the appropriate time, he would ask leave of the Senate to introduce the following bills:

A bill supplementary to "An act to provide for the adjustment of titles to land in the town of Detroit, and Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes."

A bill for the relief of J. and W. Beeson, and others.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana gave notice that, as soon as it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to authorize the New Albany and Mount Carmel Railroad Company to enter, on a credit, a quantity of land, to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albany to Mount Carmel, Illinois.

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Col. Francis Vigo.

Mr. ROANE gave notice that, as soon as it would be proper to do so, he would ask leave to introduce a bill giving the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company.

Mr. LINN gave notice that, as soon as it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others.

A bill to authorize payment to be made to certain Missouri volunteers, for services in the years 1829 and 1830.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as has been received at the Treasury Department from consuls and secretaries of legation respecting the fiscal regulations in force in foreign countries, and not contained in his communication to the Senate of the date of January 21, 1839.

Mr. LINN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate any information in the Department of State, or any other Department, relative to the disputed boundary between the State of Missouri and the Territory of Iowa, and which has not been heretofore communicated to the House of Representatives; and also to communicate copies of any proclamations of the Governor of Missouri and the Governor of the Territory of Iowa in relation to said disputed boundary, and the orders, if any, for calling out, or holding the militia in readiness to act in relation to the same; and also any further information on the subject which it may be in the power of the Departments to give.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the number of copies of the laws of Congress printed for the several States and Territories under the act of 20th April, 1818.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business, and afterwards

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, December 19, 1839.

The CHAIR stated the question to be on Mr. C. JOHNSON's motion to refer the resolution of Mr. WISE, together with the credentials of the New Jersey members to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. WISE rose, and stated that the gentleman from Tennessee had agreed to withdraw the motion, to allow him to address the House on his resolution, on condition that he would renew it again, which he would do with great pleasure.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON then rose to make a point. He considered the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] as inadmissible in this House, and that, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the Speaker was bound to swear in the members from New Jersey having the Governor's certificates. This was the point of order which he was about to make, and he made it with a view of bringing this matter to a speedy and conclusive issue. He maintained that the Speaker had no discretionary power in this matter, but that he was bound to administer the oath to these gentlemen at once.

The CHAIR said the gentleman could not proceed now, without the leave of the House on his proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON appealed to the courtesy of the House to grant him leave, and declared he would not occupy the time of the House more than five minutes He was about proceeding, when

Mr. TURNEY rose and objected to the gentleman's proceeding, inasmuch as the CHAIR had decided that it was out of order for him to proceed.

The CHAIR said he had decided that the gentleman was out of order, but as the gentleman had appealed to the House, and no objection had been made at the time, he had permitted him to proceed.

Mr. TURNEY. The gentleman did not appeal from the decision of the CHAIR to the House, therefore he could not proceed without leave of the House.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then asked leave of the House to proceed.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered.

Mr. JAMESON wished to know if it was competent, at this late stage of the proceedings, to raise a point of order of this kind? The CHAIR had, on yesterday morning, made this decision, and after it had been debated for a whole day, the gentleman comes forward and raises a question of order this morning. Why did he not do so on yesterday morning, when the decision was made? And as the gentleman had not made it at that time, he contended it was not in order for him to make it now. If this course of proceeding was to be adopted, the House might be thrown into inextricable difficulties. Questions might be brought up and discussed for weeks, and just when the House was about coming to a decision, a question of order might be raised, which would open the whole question up anew.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON then read his proposition to the House, and stated that it was based upon the Constitution, and hoped it would always be in order to defend the Constitution.

Mr. ATHERTON wished to know, as the CHAIR had decided the gentleman to be out of order, whether, if the House granted him permission to go on, he would not be permitted to go on out of order.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then withdrew his point of order, and appealed from the decision of the CHAIR of yesterday. He was sorry his proposition should create any uneasiness in the minds of any gentlemen He would assure gentlemen that he had not made this question with a view of creating any delay, but with a view of bringing it to a speedy conclusion.

Mr. JAMESON wished to know of the SPEAKER whether it was in order for a gentleman now, after a question had been acted upon by the House, and debated for two days, to take an appeal, under the general parliamentary law. He wished to know whether the gentleman ought not to have made that motion when the question was first brought before the House. He contended that it was not in order for the gentleman to take an appeal at the present time.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then withdrew his appeal, but gave notice that he should introduce his proposition at the earliest possible period.

Mr. WISE then obtained the floor, and was about proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. BEATTY raised a point of order, whether the gentleman from Virginia, under the thirty-fifth rule, which declares that no member shall speak more than twice until all the other members who choose to do so have spoken, was entitled to speak?

Mr. WISE denied that he had spoken at all on this question.

Mr. BEATTY would appeal to gentlemen around him to say whether the gentleman from Virginia had not spoken twenty times on this same subject since the second of December.

The CHAIR said the thirty-fifth rule was not adopted by the House, and would not apply to the present case.

Mr. WISE then took the floor, and addressed the House at great length on the subject of his resolution.

He thought that they had been fighting under an equal contest, but within the past two days, two gentlemen, who had professed to be in favor of the New Jersey gentlemen with certificates taking their seats, and who had previously voted upon that principle, had deserted, and thought proper now to take a different view of it. He did not, however, wish to shoot them as deserters, though he deeply regretted the loss of their votes. Mr. W. said the Administration party had defeated them by the tie vote, and had tied up the Constitution and laws But he regretted exceedingly to have to complain of the friends of the New Jersey Representatives who held the certificates. Well might the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] on yesterday exclaim, speaking of the friends of State Rights doctrine: "Save me from my friends" The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT] who professed to be with us, made an appeal to the House to proceed with the business. He asked that gentleman what was the business of the House; what was the first thing proper for them to do? The first thing was to organize, and to acknowledge all rightful representation, and then adopt it here. He must say, that for the delay of its organization, that gentleman was more responsible than any other member; yes, more than any ten members on that floor. It was not with a view of impeaching that gentleman's motives, that he made him responsible to make his position good. But for that gentleman's course, the House would have been organized, and the members from New Jersey would have been admitted days ago. That gentleman's course, however reconcileable to himself, was irreconcileable to him; and had been inconsistent throughout every state of the proceedings of the House; and he had found that his votes were too soon, and his speeches too late. Mr. W. then went into an examination of Mr. R's votes, his subsequent proposition, and the three propositions of himself, and the decisions on them, for the purpose of showing that Mr. R's course was not reconcileable with the reasons he gave a few days ago for a change of it. He hoped the gentleman would pardon him for being thus particular in scanning his course. He was one of the few on whom he relied—his vote, heavy or light, kicked the beam; and the gentleman would therefore excuse him in having thus questioned his votes as he had. What reason the gentleman could have had for voting for his (Mr. W's) direct proposition, substantially the same as that he subsequently voted against, he could not conceive. Certainly he would not ascribe it to personal vanity. So it was, he has given us notice, that after having voted for the proposition once, and voted against it, he would now vote against us; and on what grounds—on the grounds of res judicata. It was known to us all, he said, that on the discussion of the Mississippi question, we were all disgusted even to nausea with this res judicata. Mr. W. then referred to the case of Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, and which was, upon an ex parte report, decided that they should be qualified, and which decision he considered erroneous. Mr. W. then commented on the manner in which Mr. R. applied the res judicata.

He then denied that the principle had been adjudged, and that it was res judicata. He then went on and contended that the House was in an imperfect state of organization, when the decision was made; that the members were not sworn; there was no Speaker; and that they were not then competent to decide, having taken no oath as the Constitution required. The matter was non coram judice; and, therefore, there could be no legal decision. He then went on to explain what constituted a House of Representatives, and considered three things essential to it; 1st, representation; 2d, organization; and 3d, legislative power; and any thing short of that was not a House. He said, in the first place, when the decision of the House was made, that body was merely an assemblage of members elect, and had not the power even to send for the President's message, or communicate with the Senate—it had no Sergeant-at-Arms, and could not even protect itself from a mob. In calling the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] to the Chair, and in adopting rules of proceeding, it merely instituted parliamentary proceedings for the purpose of organization. He continued at some length to show that, before they were organized and sworn, they were not a House of Representatives.

The question, he said, had arisen in this case, whether we can go behind the Governor's certificate? We are, under the Constitution of the United States, the judges of election, qualification, and returns of members. Now, sir, what does the word "returns" mean? The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] the other day, in one of the ablest efforts I ever heard him make, committed but one mistake, and that was, the distinction between the return and the commission. The only one meant in the Constitution, was the return from the State to the Speaker; the commission of the Governor was the return contemplated by the Constitution, and so was the certificate of a sheriff in Virginia. There was no distinction between them; and Mr. W. went on to argue this point, contending that the return, contemplated as a return to the House, was the ultimate return, and not the subordinate returns from the judges of elections to the Governor. The return behind it belonged to the State itself, and to her archives, over which the House had no control. The State authorities may make the ultimate returns what they please, and we have no authority to prevent it. But gentlemen insist that there are other returns—that there are returns from the county court clerks to the Governor and Council; that you may go behind these ultimate returns, and go to the subordinate returns, which belong to the State. Gentlemen assume that there were subordinate returns of the clerks, which were suppressed. He denied that there was any evidence that they were suppressed—not deeming newspaper evidence, or the certificates of the Secretary of State, such evidence, not being authorized by the laws of New Jersey. Again, the admissions of the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. RANDOLPH, were relied on as evidence. Were we constituted a court of justice, to take evidence ore tenus, and was he cross-examined? Was the House trying the cause? Again, if you take part of the evidence, you must take all.

He then went into a history of the Millville and South Amboy returns, and argued that, according to the laws of New Jersey, these returns were not excluded by the Governor. He denied that the Secretary of State was the keeper of the returns of the judges of elections; and, consequently, he had no right to certify respecting them. Mr. W. then went on to answer that part of Mr. PICKENS's argument, in regard to the power of the States to purge the polls, after they were counted; which argument he considered a novel and extraordinary doctrine, and referred to a law of Virginia, now repealed, which constituted a commission to examine the polls which may have been taken by the sheriffs, and with power to strike out the names of all who were not entitled to vote. He said the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] a State Rights man, had pronounced that law unconstitutional.

Mr. RIVES said his colleague had quoted a law, which, in consequence of its bad effects, had been repealed.

Mr. WISE inquired of his colleague whether he said that this law was repealed because it was unconstitutional.

Mr. RIVES answered Mr. W. that the law was repealed for two reasons. One party, who opposed it, believed that it was unconstitutional; and the other party opposed it, because they believed that such a power ought not to be trusted to persons who might abuse it. For these reasons the law was repealed by a very large majority.

Mr. WISE thought his colleague was mistaken. He had another colleague, he said, by his side, who was in the Legislature at the time, and who said that no objection was made to the law on constitutional grounds.

Mr. RIVES asked when that law was repealed; and Mr. WISE replying that it was in 1834, Mr. R. rejoined that he was in the Senate of Virginia at the time.

Mr. WISE still thought that his colleague was mistaken, and that the law was opposed by no one on constitutional grounds; and then went on in a lengthy argument to show the unconstitutionality of the assumption that a State had no right to pass laws to purge the polls, after they had been taken. He then went into a refutation of the arguments of Mr. DROMGOOLE, the other day, and, in the first place, in opposition to the assumptions of that gentleman, contended that it was the States that were parties to the federal compact in the combined senses of territory, Government, and peopls, and not "the people of the States," as Mr. D. said, who were parties to that compact. This was the first State Rights doctrine that he had learned. It was in the aggregate capacity of people, territory, and Government combined, that these States were parties to the Federal compact. This was the doctrine he had always entertained, and it was the doctrine of Mr. Madison. He then proceeded to answer Mr. D's arguments throughout, and commented on the precedents cited by that gentleman, which he contended did not sustain the positions assumed by him.

Mr. W. concluded by withdrawing his own proposition, and, in compliance with a pledge made to Mr. TURNEY, who had yielded to him the floor, renewed the proposition of that gentleman, and called for the previous question upon the same.

[Mr. TURNEY's proposition was, in substance, to refer the subject of the contested seats to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, and that neither party of the claimants should be entitled to seats until the committee shall have investigated and reported upon the same.]

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then raised the point of order, which he had waved this morning, and hoped it would not be considered out of order to support the Constitution of the United States. He contended that the previous question could not be moved while five gentlemen were at the bar of the House demanding to be sworn.

Mr. BEATTY called the gentleman to order, and required that he should reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. CHAPMAN asked if it would be in order now to take up his motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution for the adoption of rules was laid on the table.

The CHAIR said that it would not be in order, because the gentleman from Maryland had the floor upon another question.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then submitted his point of order in this form: "The motion to take the previous question is not in order until the rules of the House are adopted, and when there are members present who desire to be sworn in." Mr. J. was proceeding to debate this question, and was referring to the law of 1789 in regard to the administering of oaths, and to the 6 h article of the Constitution of the United States, when

Mr. TURNEY rose to a point of order, and inquired if it was in order to debate this question?

The CHAIR decided that it was debatable, but the gentleman must confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. TURNEY. Then there is no end to this question.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then proceeded with his remarks, referring to several authorities to show that the SPEAKER was bound to administer the oath to the New Jersey members holding the Governor's certificate.

The CHAIR again interrupted the gentleman, and desired that he would confine himself to the point of order which he had raised.

Mr. JOHNSON again proceeded with his remarks, and contended that the previous question could not be put, when

Mr. JAMESON called him to order, and inquired the state of the question.

The CHAIR said he understood the gentleman to raise a question of order, as to the right of the gentleman from Virginia to move the previous question. Under the general parliamentary law, the CHAIR felt constrained to say that the previous question was a question which must govern the House. But the previous question, under that general law, was a different thing from the previous question under the rules of the last House. In regard to the duty of the CHAIR in swearing the New Jersey members, which had been referred to by the gentleman, he would say that he was merely the organ of the House, and whether it was a House de jure, or a House de facto, was not a question for him to decide; but being its organ, he was bound to carry out the decisions which it had made, and which were staring him in the face. This was the opinion of the CHAIR; and if the gentleman desired to sustain contrary views, he must appeal from this decision.

Mr. JOHNSON then appealed from the latter part of the decision of the CHAIR, and was proceeding again to refer to the authorities before him, when

Mr RIVES called him to order, because he was pursuing the same course of argument which the CHAIR had decided to be out of order.

The CHAIR said the gentleman must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON proceeded, and was reading a clause from the law of New Jersey on the subject of the elections, when

Mr. JAMESON rose to a point of order. He contended that if gentlemen were permitted to take an appeal from but a single point of the decision of the CHAIR, they might appeal on fifty different points in decision, and there would be no end to the question. He thought the gentleman was begging the question by the course which he was pursuing.

Mr. JOHNSON then withdrew his appeal, and submitted a point of order in writing, that the gentleman from Virginia could not make his motion when there were five members at the bar demanding to be sworn.

The CHAIR. If the gentleman withdraws his appeal, the question is upon the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I withdraw my point of order, and renew the appeal. Mr. J. was again proceeding to read the law of New Jersey, when,

The CHAIR called him to order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee moved that the gentleman from Maryland have leave to proceed with his remarks, which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON then addressed the House at length upon his appeal, contending that the CHAIR was bound to swear in the members from New Jersey having the Governor's certificates, and referring to a great many authorities under the articles of Confederation, the Constitution of the United States and the State Constitution.

Mr. ADAMS next obtained the floor, expressed his intention of addressing the House, and moved an adjournment.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS called for the yeas and nays on the adjournment; which were ordered, and were—yeas 117, nays 107.

The house then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, December 20, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States, and being of an Executive character,

The Senate went in into an Executive session, and afterwards,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, December 20, 1839.

The question pending was on an appeal taken by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] that a proposition could be submitted while there were members of the House waiting to be sworn.

Mr. CHAPMAN said that he had made a motion the other day to reconsider the vote by which the resolution for the adoption of rules had been laid on the table, which motion had been entered, and on yesterday he had moved that this motion be taken up, but it had been decided by the CHAIR that it could not be taken up while the motion then pending, which was the resolution of Mr. WISE, was before the House; that resolution, however, had been withdrawn and another moved, and he held that his motion to reconsider had precedence of this latter motion.

The CHAIR stated that the motion had been entered on the journal, he presumed, to enable the gentleman to bring it up at a future time. The CHAIR, however, was of opinion, on an examination of the subject, that the right to make that motion was given under the rules of the House, which had not yet been adopted, it being a motion not known to the parliamentary law. He would, however, suggest to the gentleman that he could obtain his object by moving that the rules of the last House be adopted for the government of this body, which motion would be in order at any time when there was no motion pending. At present, however, there was a question pending on an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, taken by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. JAMESON. Do I understand the CHAIR to say that the motion to reconsider is not known to the parliamentary law?

The CHAIR. That is the impression of the Chair.

Mr. JAMESON said, if gentlemen would refer to the book, they would see that that was one of first established principles of parliamentary law. It was of far older dates than the rules of the House. If, therefore, the CHAIR still held to the opinion expressed, he would feel bound to take an appeal.

Mr. BRIGGS contended that the question before the House was a question of privilege, therefore a motion to reconsider could not be made until it was disposed of.

Mr. POPE said the first business under the Constitution which could come before the House, was the election of a Speaker, and the next was the swearing in of the members. Now, as the members had not all been sworn in, no other business could come up, until that was disposed of.

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired whether the question of priority of business was not under the control of a majority of the House, and whether, if the majority desired to adopt the rules of the House, they could not do so now, or at any time.

The CHAIR thought it was in the power of the majority of the House to adopt rules.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then moved that the rules of the last House be adopted for the Government of this House, and on that motion moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE raised a point of order, whether any motion could be made until the question before the House was disposed of.

The CHAIR decided that the motion of the gentleman from New York could not be made while there was another question before the House.

Mr. CHAPMAN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor on Mr. JOHNSON's appeal made yesterday, claimed the floor, and proceeded to address the House.

Mr. CHAPMAN called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order.

Mr. HOFFMAN then rose, and said, if gentlemen were desirous of adopting rules to prevent disorder in the House, and relieve the CHAIR from embarrassment, without having any other object in view, he would submit a proposition, which would effect the desired object. Mr. H. then presented a resolution, which was read, that the rules and orders of the last Congress be adopted for the government of this House, except the last rule, [the viva voce rule]

Mr. VANDERPOEL. The viva voce rule is one of great importance, and there can be no good reason for laying it aside at this time. If the motion which he had made a few minutes ago was in order, he desired that it might be put to the House.

Mr. ADAMS objected to the introduction of any resolution for the adoption of rules until the House had organized according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. By the act of 22d May, 1832, "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected"—

Mr. VANDERPOEL called the gentleman to order. He had made a motion, which had been entertained by the CHAIR, and the gentleman could not speak on another question.

Mr. ADAMS said he was speaking to a point of order, which had precedence of the other.

The CHAIR said the gentleman from Massachusetts must take his seat. There was a point of order now before the CHAIR on an appeal taken by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the CHAIR decide that while I am speaking on a point of order, that another point of order can be made which will override the one I am speaking on?

The CHAIR said he had decided against a certain motion. The gentleman from Alabama had appealed from that decision, and the CHAIR was bound to entertain that appeal.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I may make another point of order, and if the CHAIR decides against me, I may appeal from that decision, and it will take precedence. Another gentleman may then raise another point and appeal, and so we may go on in an eternal wheel, without there being any end to the matter.

Mr. CHAPMAN said that the point he had made was with regard to the priority of business, and if the CHAIR entertained his motion, it was impossible for gentlemen to overleap it and supersede it with something else.

Mr. ADAMS contended that the very point he was desirous of discussing, was with regard to the priority of business. It was that the House could do no other business, until all its members were sworn.

Mr. CHAPMAN then rose, and stated that as the gentleman from Massachusetts was anxious to occupy the floor, and as he had been requested by several gentlemen to withdraw his motion, he would do so, giving notice, however, that he would bring it it forward again at the earliest period possible, and he hoped no objection would then be made to it.

Mr ADAMS, who was entitled to the floor on the point of order raised by Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, contended that it was not competent for the House to entertain the previous question, or any other motion, while the question of the right of the New Jersey members to be sworn was pending. Mr. A. then examined the constitutional question [in reply to Mr. PICKENS] as to the powers of the House over the returns, elections, and qualifications, of the members. He argued at some length against the principles advanced by that gentleman as to the distinction between the returns and the elections. He said that a majority of the House, at that stage of the proceedings, was not sufficient to decide the question of right, inasmuch as the effect of the decision was tantamount to an expulsion, which required, by the Constitution, a vote of two-thirds. That decision, he said, was illegal, unconstitutional, null and void, on the ground, also, that the House, in its then unorganized state, had no power, under the Constitution, to decide any question; and that, even under its present partial organization, had not the power to declare that the gentlemen from New Jersey with the Governor's certificates should not participate in the further organization of the House, because, upon the principles of the Constitution and the laws, these gentlemen stood upon the same footing as the other Representatives, and could be expelled with the same propriety, by an objection being raised by those the House had excluded. He then replied to some of the arguments which had been advanced as to the respect which should be paid to the broad seal of a State, and said that it was not the mere seal which claimed the respect of the House, but the principle which lies under it. The power which formed the seal could break it and substitute some other form if it pleased, but it was the form adopted by that State to make its power known here, and as such should be acknowledged by us. The seal was the proof of record, and was the only evidence of record which would claim the attention of any court of justice—it was with courts the highest authority—it was the proof of record which was acknowledged, and belonged to all civilized nations. The question now, he said, was whether the House was willing to destroy this highest kind of evidence, and whether the power of that State should be acknowledged by the best evidence it could produce of its sovereignty; that these members bearing this seal could not be rejected, without rejecting the evidence and the seal. The seal, he said, bore upon its face no fraud, but gentlemen had suspicions that there was fraud behind it, but were unwilling to extend their suspicions to the ballot box, where there was fraud by illegal votes. He did not know which of the suspicions was founded in truth, whether in illegal votes, or in making the returns; and it was a question which was to be decided by the House as judges hereafter; and, in the mean time, the gentlemen with certificates should have their seats. He said, to support him in this position, he had higher authority than the law of the British Parliament, which had been so frequently cited. He had the authority of Blackstone, which goes so far as to say that if even a sheriff or returning officer should be bribed to return a person other than the one elected, that the person thus returned should be permitted to take and occupy his seat until the return should be proved illegal. This, too, was a part of the law of Parliament. Mr. A. after arguing on this principle for some time, hoped that this question would be settled, not by arbitrary will or power, but by adjudication. He congratulated the House on the selection it had made of Speaker; that he had been taken from neither of the great contending parties. He considered it a Providential interference that this election had terminated in the same way as if the five New Jersey gentlemen had been permitted to take their seats; it was an act of retribution on the party that excluded them.

Mr. ADAMS had continued for some time with his remarks, and had been discussing the merits of the principal question, reviewing the course of the House in regard to the New Jersey election cases; when

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS rose to a point of order, which he reduced to writing, as follows:

Because the question before the House is on an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, that "the motion to take the previous question is not in order until the rules of the House are adopted, and when there are members present who desire to be sworn;" and the gentleman is discussing the merits of the New Jersey election, and reviewing the proceedings of the House on the New Jersey election.

The SPEAKER gave it as his opinion that it was not competent for a member, while addressing the House on the question of the appeal, then before it, to enter into the merits of the main question. He had allowed (the SPEAKER said) the gentleman from Massachusetts to indulge in a greater latitude of debate than was consistent with parliamentary law, because, on the same question of order as was now raised, the House yesterday permitted the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] by almost a unanimous vote, to take a very wide range in the course of his remarks. As to the point of order, however, was now raised by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] the CHAIR must reiterate his decision of yesterday, and say that the gentleman from Massachusetts was not in order.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS then moved that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to go on with his remarks, in order, and proceeded to give his reasons for the motion.

After some remarks from Messrs. POPE, JAMESON, and MERCER, and a repetition of his decision by the CHAIR,

Mr. JAMESON stated the question as he understood it. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, that he could entertain the motion for the previous question while the point of order raised by him in relation to the swearing in of the New Jersey members was before him. This being the simple question before the House, he would object to the gentleman from Massachusetts travelling out of the line of debate prescribed by the Speaker. The gentleman from Massachusetts ought not to be permitted to speak on the merits of the main question, and spin out his argument on matters which they had heard repeated one thousand times.

Mr. MERCER said he knew not what right a member had to move that another member should be permitted to proceed with his remarks, when he had not been pronounced by the CHAIR to be out of order. The motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] was out of order, and was not sanctioned by any of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr MERCER,] that he had pronounced the member from Massachusetts to be out of order; but, at the same time, stated that he had permitted him to indulge in a wide range in the course of his remarks, because the House yesterday permitted the gentleman from Maryland to take the same course. The member from Maryland having now raised the point of order with regard to the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the CHAIR was obliged to pronounce the latter out of order.

After a few remarks from Mr. MERCER,

The SPEAKER said he conceived the gentleman from Maryland to have appealed from that decision of the CHAIR which permitted the previous question to be called in the present condition of of the House—that is, as stated in the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maryland, when there were members here from the State of New Jersey, waiting to be sworn. Now, the view which the CHAIR gave of that question yesterday, and which he still entertained, was, that the very question which they were trying, was the question of the right of these gentlemen to be sworn, and to arrive at the decision of that question, they must proceed according to the rules of parliamentary law. One of these parliamentary rules was the previous question; and the CHAIR, by deciding that the previous question could be entertained, gave a decision which would facilitate that of the main question.

Mr. BYNUM rose to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] to withdraw his question of order, and to permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed with his remarks. He was tired, he said, of this continued game of "hide and seek." We have, said he, been going on for weeks in a useless and interminable debate, and are no nearer to the end than when we started. There appeared to be a disposition on the part of many members to meet this question; and he, for one, was willing and ready to meet it. The argument hitherto, had been only on one side; and he thought it was time for something to be said on the other. The gentleman from Massachusetts was proceeding today precisely as the gentleman from Maryland was permitted to do yesterday, by an almost unanimous vote of the House; and he would ask, then, where was the propriety of calling a gentleman to order for taking too wide a range in his remarks, and then, by a solemn vote of the House, permitting him to go on with them, and take as wide a range as he pleased? This, he thought, was too much like trifling with the serious questions before the body. If the gentleman from Massachusetts was permitted to go on, by a vote of the House, would it not be unjust to the rest of the members to refuse them permission to answer him. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his point of order, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts, by the general consent of the House, might be permitted to go on with the utmost latitude; and that those who wished to answer him might be allowed the same privilege. If the gentleman could not be answered, he would be willing to vote with him; but the gentleman could be answered, and he, for one was ready to answer him.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS observed that the gentleman last up [Mr. BYNUM] had expressed a wish to participate in this debate; and there were other gentlemen, also, who wished to engage in it. He was well aware of this, and for this reason, he had interposed his point of order to arrest the wide range the debate was taking, and to confine gentlemen to the single question before the House. It was with the greatest reluctance he had interposed to arrest the course the gentleman from Massachusetts was taking, and he did it with greater reluctance than he would so act towards any member of that House. But he did it because, if the debate was suffered to take this latitude, there would be no knowing where it would end, and the great interests of the nation would be neglected. He voted yesterday for his colleague to proceed in order, and would vote to-day that the gentleman from Massachusetts might be permitted to proceed in like manner. His object was, however, that every gentleman who took part in the discussion should be restricted to the limits prescribed by the Speaker; that is, confine himself to a discussion of the question immediately before the House. The CHAIR had prescribed what the limits were to which the debate should be confined. The sole topic of discussion would be, whether, in the discretion of the CHAIR, the parliamentary laws are binding on this body; and if so, was the previous question within the parliamentary law. This was a limited question, and he hoped the debate would be confined to it.

Mr. BELL hoped the House would get through this difficulty without discussing points unnecessarily. If the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina should be acceded to, the debate could go on; if not, he should then insist upon this proposition. Even after the second by the House of the previous question, the subject would be open to discussion, and the gentleman from Massachusetts would have the privilege of moving an amendment of the proposition before them, and on that amendment he could discuss the merits of the question with as much latitude as he pleased. Mr. BELL here explained the difference between the previous question, as known to the parliamentary law, and the previous question contained in the rules of the House of the last session, and quoted from the 2d volume of Hatsel's Precedents to show the correctness of his position.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS said to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] that the House was now about to decide upon the validity of the decision given by the CHAIR, that the previous question could be entertained by the House. The CHAIR had decided that, by the parliamentary law, the question could be entertained, and from that decision his colleague had appealed, because he alleged that the House could entertain no question while the members from New Jersey were waiting to be sworn in. The gentleman from Tennessee would see that he would make confusion worse confounded, if he succeeded in showing that the greatest latitude should be allowed to the debate now, because such latitude must be allowed after the decision of the House that the previous question shall be put. He was for confining the House to the single proposition then before it, which was the appeal of his colleague. When that question was decided, he would be willing to meet the gentleman from Tennessee with his authorities. The gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor to discuss the subject of the appeal taken by his colleague; but he was not authorized to indulge in the latitude of debate which he had thought proper to take.

Mr. BELL said he understood all that had been said by the gentleman from Maryland, and agreed with him; and he was proceeding to show that the play was not worth the candle, while the proposition of the member from North Carolina was the most rational one; for the moment the question of appeal was decided, and the previous question seconded, the gentleman from Massachusetts could have the greatest latitude of debate allowed him. For his own part he had no objection to deciding the question of appeal at once, and to affirm the decision of the CHAIR. He would also go for the decision of the CHAIR that the question before the House involved the very question as to the admission of the New Jersey members.

After some remarks from Mr. MERCER on the point of order involved,

Mr. ADAMS, by general consent, resumed and concluded his remarks, when

Mr. RHETT addressed the House at some length, in reply to the remarks of Mr. WISE, charging him with having acted inconsistently in regard to the New Jersey members, and in reply to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS; but his remarks were indistinctly heard by the reporter. He commenced by saying that, in his observations the other day, he had expressed the opinion that when we had then passed a resolution, refusing to the New Jersey members seats, we were a House of Representatives, and he had stated farther, that being a House, and having adjudicated on the case, it was contrary to parliamentary usage to take up the same case again for adjudication. No gentleman who had addressed the House since, had controverted this position. The case of Claiborne and Gholson, referred to by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, had no application at all to the present case. In that case, seats had been given to those gentleman at one session, and the next session this decision had been reversed, and certainly one Congress had the right to reverse the decision of a former session. What he contended for was this: When the House had once made a decision, and determined upon a question, it was not competent for any gentleman, according to parliamentary law, to bring up that proposition again: and that proposition had not been controverted. But the gentleman from Massachusetts held that it was contrary to morality, and contrary to what was right, for him (Mr. R.) to hold to this opinion. Then, said Mr. R. according to this doctrine, if the House has done wrong, in my view, in making a decision, I must not act according to parliamentary usage, but must go directly against it, for the purpose of accomplishing what I believe to be right. Is this the principle which gentlemen desire that I should act upon? He would not question the conduct of any gentleman on this floor—he would condemn no man here; but while he did not do this, he would certainly exercise his own views as to what became him as a member on this floor, disregarding the opinions or the sophistry of any man. He had said further, when he addressed the House the other day, that as the people were looking to this body to do something speedily, and as the great interests of the country required us to act, he was prepared to support that proposition which would bring this debate to a speedy termination. With a view of getting at the business which was of such vital interest to the country at large, he felt bound to support that proposition, whatever it might be, which would preclude debate.

With regard to this New Jersey case, he did not estimate it as some gentlemen seemed to do. He considered that the House, having the power to determine, did determine it; not disfranchising the people of New Jersey, but as he understood, even by the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] himself, it was to be made a matter of contested election, to be decided by the House hereafter, in the proper and constitutional manner. Then it can be no disfranchisement.

He had never contended that the title, which gentlemen laid so much stress upon, should be violated. On the contrary, he had contended that we were to be the judges of the title, and that that was the matter which we were bound to decide upon. The House consented to this course in the case of Messrs. Naylor and Ingersoll. The titles which both these gentlemen held, were read, and he had voted for Mr. NAYLOR. This was the course proposed in regard to the New Jersey members; and, in this case, he had held that you could not invalidate the title, but were bound to look into it. Well, sir, when you came to look into the papers on the Clerk's table, what was the state of things presented? In the first place, there was a certificate of title from the Governor of New Jersey; secondly, an impugnment of that title; and thirdly, a certificate that that impugnment was correct. The House took up this matter, and upon this evidence, decided that the five members, having the certificate of Governor, should not take their seats. Then the position which he maintained was, that the matter had been adjudicated upon by a competent body; and could gentlemen doubt the correctness of this position? Was this the House of Representatives, were we members of Congress, when we made this decision? If we were not members of Congress, as had been contended by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] then he agreed that our determination of the question was null and void. But if this was a House of Representatives at the time it made the decision, it was perfectly competent for it to adjudicate the matter; and, having done so, that adjudication must be final until the question was brought up as a matter of contested election. The gentleman from Virginia, and other gentlemen, had charged him with inconsistency; but when gentlemen make those charges, they should recollect that they who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones. When gentlemen made charges of inconsistency against others, they should be certain that their own course was consistent. It will be recollected that the gentleman from Virginia has declared over and over again, in debate on this floor, that the House has made no decision upon this question, and that there was no House to make a decision; yet that gentleman had introduced resolutions in that body which he declared was no House, calling it a House, and calling us the Representatives in the Congress of the United States. The gentleman's first resolution, introduced before the gentleman from Massachusetts was called to the Chair, read as follows:

Resolved, That the Representatives of the Congress of the United States now assembled, to relieve themselves from the embarrassment and difficulties which at present obstruct the organization of the House, will proceed, by the Acting Clerk, to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested; and, after the names of such members are all called, and before they proceed to elect a Speaker or other officer, or to organize in any manner, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, hear and decide upon all credentials, certificates, or commissions of persons claiming seats in the House of Representatives under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the respective States.

Here the gentleman confesses that we were at that time the "Representatives of the Congress of the United States;" and in the latter part of the resolution he speaks of the disputed members as "claiming seats in the House of Representatives;" and he grants that House the power, by his resolution, to "hear and decide" upon all credentials, certificates, and commissions, of persons claiming seats. Here, then, the gentleman granted that the House could exercise judicial power at the time he submitted his resolution, because he made it, or attempted to make it, the duty of the House, by his resolution, to "hear and decide" upon the credentials, certificates, or commissions, of the five members from New Jersey. This was the ground taken by the gentleman from Virginia in the first instance; and he (Mr. R.) with this resolution before him, and with other propositions which had been made to the House before him, had submitted a proposition to the House at a later period in the following words:

Resolved, That the House will proceed to call the names of gentlemen whose rights to seats are not disputed or contested; and after the names of such members are called, and before a Speaker is elected, they shall, provided there be a quorum of such present, then hear and adjudge upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of all claimants to the seats contested on this floor.

This resolution, as he had stated at the time of introducing it, was substantially the same as that presented by the gentleman from Virginia; substantially the same as the one presented by a gentleman from Kentucky; and substantially the same as the one presented at the last session of Congress by the gentleman from Massachusetts; and he did expect that it would meet with the support of those gentlemen. He had expected that every one of those gentlemen would rally upon this resolution, and he never had expected that those gentlemen would stand up and oppose, much less had he expected that they would rise up here and deny the doctrines set forth in their own resolutions; and deny that it was either right, proper, constitutional, or parliamentary for the House to make a decision on the question at that time.

Mr. WISE rose to explain. By the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, which had just been read, the House was to decide on the "elections, returns, and qualifications" of claimants, and he denied the power of the House, at that stage, to go into the elections.

Mr. RHETT. The ground the gentleman took in his argument was, that we had no right to adjudicate on this matter, but by his resolution he yielded the power to the House to hear and decide upon the commissions of all claimants.

Mr. WISE rose again to explain. He contended now, as he had contended before, that the Clerk was the ministerial officer to compare the credentials which the gentlemen from New Jersey brought here under the laws of New Jersey; and when we deposed the Clerk, we became the ministerial officers. We then became the ministerial officers to hear the credentials, and decide upon them—that is, to decide whether they corresponded with the laws of New Jersey; and his position was that we could decide nothing else; therefore it was, that he had used the terms credentials, certificates and commissions.

Mr. RHETT resumed. When this resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was presented, he (Mr. R.) was asked by a member of the House whether it covered all the papers on the Clerk's table, the certificates of the Governor, the certificates of the Secretary of State and all other papers on the subject; and when the gentleman from Virginia found that it did cover all these papers, he withdrew his resolution. Now, when he (Mr. R.) proposed his resolution, he made use of the terms "elections, returns, and qualifications," because he thought they were the appropriate terms. He contended that the House had again and again exercised judicial power. When the question in regard to the Pennsylvania election came up, the Clerk, by the consent of the House, read the credentials on both sides. He did not adjudge whether Mr. INGERSOLL or Mr. NAYLOR was entitled to the seat, but the House decided that Mr. NAYLOR was entitled to his seat. The gentleman from Virginia had said on yesterday that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. NAYLOR) could not be turned out except by a vote of two-thirds; but, sir, how did he get into his seat so firmly, but by the adjudication of this House, and that, too, at a time when the gentleman from Virginia had contended that the House could not adjudicate upon any matter, before a Speaker was elected, before the roll had been called over, and before the oath had been administered to the members of the House. Mr. R. then read two or three other resolutions, which had been submitted by the gentleman from Virginia at different stages of their proceedings before a Speaker was elected, in all of which that gentleman had used the terms "the House," or "the House of Representatives," and upon all of these resolutions the action of the adjudication of the House had been asked. Was it possible that gentlemen should bring forward proposition after proposition, and ask us to decide upon them, if we were not a House, and had not the power to adjudicate upon any question? Was it possible that gentlemen would be guilty of the absurdity of bringing forward proposition after proposition, which they believed the House had no power to decide; for it will be recollected that nearly all these propositions were brought forward by those gentlemen who held that this body had no judicial power to determine the matter presented to it.

He had no desire to condemn the course of certain gentlemen, with regard to their course on this question; but if he might be permitted to express an opinion, he would say, without hesitation, that they had exhibited but very little parliamentary skill. The had this matter in their own hands—they had a clear majority in the first instance in favor of the members from New Jersey, holding the Governor's certificates. Then how was it, that when they came to a vote, there was a tie upon the question? He would tell gentlemen how it happened. When the members of this House first assembled here, they only looked to the abstract constitutional principle; and by so doing, there was a majority in favor of the New Jersey members taking their seats upon the returns of the Governor; but when gentlemen threw so much embarrassment in the way, and went on from one step to another without coming to any decision, the minds of many gentlemen here began to turn away from the abstraction, and look into the right and equity of the matter. There was no doubt if gentlemen had marched up to the question at once, they would have had a majority in their favor, but by sheer bad management and want of parliamentary skill, they had lost from ten to fifteen votes. And even at the last moment, when victory was still within their grasp, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and his friends were defeated by his unskilfulness in submitting the question, having offered an affirmative proposition, instead of a negative, and losing it by a tie vote.

Again: a proposition had been brought before the House by the gentleman from Virginia, "That the credentials of Messrs. AYCRIGG, MAXWELL, HALSTED, STRATTON, and YORKE, are sufficient to entitle them to seats now, leaving the question of contested elections to be afterwards decided by the House." Well, he (Mr. R.) had voted for this resolution, although it was rejected by the House; and when he voted for it, he intended to stand by it. But what was the course of gentlemen on the other side? Did they leave the question of contested elections to be afterwards decided by the House? No, sir. They did not. The gentleman from Virginia made a question of membership, by asking the Speaker to swear in the New Jersey members. In doing this, he did not pretend to say that the gentleman did any thing wrong; but when he had voted for a proposition to leave the question of contested elections to be afterwards decided by the House, he would ask if it was consistent in the gentleman to refuse to leave that question to be afterwards decided, and to make a question of membership, by asking the SPEAKER to swear in those persons. The gentleman from Virginia had not stood by his own resolution; and with what face could that gentleman charge him with inconsistency. Was he (Mr. R.) to be charged with inconsistency, because he stood by his resolution; and could not change as some others had changed? He trusted not. Mr. R. held that the House had the power to adjudicate upon the question with regard to the New Jersey members; and having done it, it was not competent for the House to bring up the same proposition again.

Mr. CHAPMAN obtained the floor, and moved that the House take up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution for the adoption of rules was laid on the table.

The CHAIR decided that this motion was not now in order.

Mr. CHAPMAN appealed from this decision, and moved the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. JAMESON moved to lay the appeal, and the questions connected with it, on the table; but was understood to withdraw his motion.

Mr. TURNEY inquired of the CHAIR, whether it was in his power to withdraw the resolution which the gentleman from Virginia, according to a previous understanding, moved for him, and what would be the effect of withdrawing it. He wished to know whether it would not leave before the House the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CHAPMAN] to reconsider the vote laying on the table the resolution for adopting the rules.

Mr. WISE thought the resolution having been received by the House, could not be withdrawn, without its consent.

A desultory discussion on the point of order here ensued, in which Messrs. CHAPMAN, BELL, TURNEY, WISE, and others, took part; when,

Mr. TURNEY asked permission of the House to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called Mr. TURNEY to order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE observed that there was no question of order. The House was without rules, and therefore, no question of order could be raised. He now submitted to the CHAIR this proposition; whether a motion to adopt rules for the government of the proceedings of the House, did not override all questions of order? I now, (said Mr. D.) propose that we adopt the rules of the last House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER said the question before the House was, whether the gentleman from Tennessee should have leave to withdraw his resolution; and

The question was then taken on granting to Mr. TURNEY leave to withdraw his resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CHAPMAN then rose and asked what was the question before the House?

Mr. EVANS of Maine having risen at the same time, the SPEAKER said the gentleman from Maine was entitled to the floor. Mr. EVANS then proceeded to address the House at some length, contending that there could be no question before the House, until the gentleman claiming seats from New Jersey were sworn, and that the SPEAKER was wrong in receiving any motion whatever, excepting this motion respecting the qualification of the New Jersey members. Mr. EVANS having proceeded at some length,

Mr. CHAPMAN called him to order, and said that he had no right to address the House on the question of swearing the New Jersey members, when the only question that could be in order, was his motion for a reconsideration.

Mr. EVANS, by the decision of the CHAIR in his favor, continued his remarks for some time, when he was again interrupted on the point of order.

Mr. CHAPMAN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and reduced his point of order and appeal to writing, as follows:

I call the gentleman from Maine to order for this—he is out of order in attempting to speak at all on the question, which is this: "The member from Alabama makes a motion to reconsider a vote which the CHAIR decides out of order, from which the member from Alabama takes an appeal, and calls the previous question."

Mr. HUBBARD called for the previous question; and

After some remarks from Messrs. CHAPMAN and EVANS,

Mr. CHAPMAN asked leave to withdraw his resolution and appeal; which, on taking the question, was agreed to.

Messrs. EVANS and CHAPMAN then both rising at the same time, and claiming the floor,

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from Maine rose in his seat, and the gentleman from Alabama rose in the aisle; the gentleman from Maine, therefore, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. EVANS then continued his remarks for a few moments, when

Mr. RIVES rose to a point of order. He wished to know what question was before the House.

The SPEAKER replied that no question was before the House.

Mr. RIVES said he would then submit to the CHAIR whether the gentleman from Maine could make a speech when there was no question before the House?

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Maine had the floor and might submit a resolution.

MR. EVANS said there was a question before the House, and that was, Shall the New Jersey members be sworn?

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked the CHAIR if this was the question before the House, and whether the SPEAKER had put any such question.

The SPEAKER said that, feeling some doubts as to the propriety of swearing in those gentlemen, he had stated the difficulty to the House, and said that it would be a question for the House to decide; but he had propounded no question.

Mr. TURNEY then wished to know how the gentleman from Maine could go on with his speech, when there was no question before the House.

Mr. EVANS said that as he was about to submit a resolution, he would do it now, and that would go to the very quest on he contended was before the House.

Mr. E. then submitted his resolution, as follows, after which he continued his remarks at some length:

Resolved, That the Speaker now proceed to swear in the members from New Jersey, who produce the legal certificate or commission according to the laws of New Jersey.

Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS then rose and observed, that it was not his purpose at this time to enter into a discussion of a subject already exhausted. But he would submit to gentlemen whether the debate had not been protracted long enough, and whether it would not be better, by general consent, to take the vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. This subject, Mr. W. said, had been discussed over and over again; every gentleman who wished to speak on it, had had an opportunity of doing so, and some had spoken several times. He hoped, therefore, that, by general consent, the debate would now cease, and the question be taken. It was high time, in his opinion, that they should organize the House, and proceed to the transaction of the public business. Mr. W. then moved the previous question on Mr. EVANS's resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the previous question on the table.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] had called for the previous question on the resolution of the gentleman from Maine, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] had moved to lay the motion for that question on the table. The CHAIR was of opinion that these questions could not be filed on each other, and therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky was first in order.

Mr. TURNEY then moved for a call of the House, and the yeas and nays having been called for, and ordered on that motion, the question was taken by them, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 148, nays 58.

The call of the House was then proceeded with; after which, the number of absentees reported were ordered to be sent for by a vote of the House.

The absentees appearing, with the exception of those members who were excused in consequence of indisposition,

On motion of Mr. JAMESON, the further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. EVANS then modified his resolution, so as to read that the members present of the Twenty-sixth Congress, request the SPEAKER to swear in the New Jersey members.

Mr. TURNEY renewed the call for the previous question on Mr. EVANS's resolution, and the call having been seconded by the House, the main question was put, "shall the resolution pass?" and it was decided in the negative—yeas 112, nays 116, as follows:

So the House refused to permit the gentlemen who were commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey to be sworn.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he had prepared a resolution, which he was about to submit to the House, which embodied the wishes of a large majority of its members, as recently expressed to him by many of them. He remembered how anxious the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] was to have rules adopted, for the purpose of guiding the House in its proceedings, and the SPEAKER in his decisions. Several others of the gentlemen of the Administration party were equally anxious, and their object was only to have them adopted, for the purpose of preserving the decorum of debate, and for relieving the new SPEAKER from the responsibility and embarrassment the want of them occasioned. There was no covert purpose concealed behind these avowed objects. They had nothing in view but to establish a set of rules for the purposes they had mentioned, and he had no doubt, therefore, but the resolution he was about to offer, would meet their support.

Mr. H. would observe, however, that there were many of these rules that were warring with the wishes of a majority of the members; and if they were, in a body, once adopted, gentlemen would see how impossible it would be to get any of them changed, because a change could only be effected by a vote of two-thirds. He had therefore proposed a resolution to adopt the rules of the last House temporarily, until a report could be made on them by a committee, with the exception of the 11th rule, which he proposed to strike out. Mr. H. then offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on it.

Resolved, That the standing rules and orders of the last House of Representatives, except the 11th rule, be adopted as the rules and order of proceeding of this House for the ensuing ten days; that the rules and orders be referred to a committee, with instructions to report such amendments of the said rules and orders as they may deem expedient.

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired of the gentleman from New York what the 11th rule was that he proposed to have stricken out?

Mr. HOFFMAN replied that it was the rule prescribing the viva voce manner of voting in electing officers of the House.

Mr. CRAIG asked if an amendment to the resolution would be in order after the previous question was moved?

The SPEAKER said that, under the parliamentary law, by which only the House was now governed, a motion for the previous question did not cut off amendments. A motion to amend the resolution would, therefore, be in order.

Mr. CRAIG then moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "with the exception of the 11th rule."

Mr. BELL offered an amendment to strike out the 40th and 41st rules in relation to the previous question, which, as it now stood, was liable to great objections. He did not wish to do away with this principle altogether, but wished it referred to a committee to undergo certain modifications.

Mr. FILLMORE also offered an amendment, the effect of which the reporter did not understand; but it was subsequently withdrawn by Mr. F.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS said that he was one of the number of those who entertained the opinion that it was not necessary, at this time, to go into a discussion of the propriety of modifying the rules under which they had acted for the last two sessions, with regard to the manner of putting the previous question. He would now content himself with saying that, after experiencing much inconvenience from the want of them, the House found it necessary to adopt the rules which the gentlemen from Tennessee proposed to dispense with. Mr. T. thought that now was not the time to go into a consideration of these rules, and that the House would find it much more to its convenience to take them as they existed at the last session of Congress. To get at a decision of the question—to get the majority with him—he would move to lay on the table the resolution of the gentleman from New York, together with the amendments that had been offered to it, for the purpose of submitting, as a substitute for it, a resolution providing for the adoption of the rules as they stood at the last session. If the CHAIR would look at the parliamentary law, he would find that a motion to lay on the table had precedence of a motion for the previous question.

Mr. BELL observed that if it should be so decided by the CHAIR that the motion to lay on the table had the precedence, and that motion should prevail, he should then object to the gentleman from Maryland offering his substitute; because, by the parliamentary law, you cannot adopt the substance of the same proposition that was laid on the table.

Mr. JAMESON observed that, according to the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Tennessee, the resolution of the gentleman from New York could not be adopted, for the substance of it had been laid on the table, and the gentleman and his party had pertinaciously refused this morning to take it up. Nay, there was an appeal of the gentleman from Alabama from the decision of the CHAIR, that the motion to reconsider the vote on laying this very resolution on the table could not be taken up. But all this (Mr. J. said) was foreign to the subject. It was absurd to suppose that they could not adopt rules for their government because points of order might be interposed. He was of the opinion that they had the right to adopt rules for their government at any time, from the very necessity of the case.

Mr. MERCER made a few observations, giving his opinions on the subject of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana offered as a substitute to Mr. HOFFMAN'S resolution, a resolution providing for the adoption of the rules of the last House of Representatives, until otherwise ordered by a majority of the House.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana was not in order, as the question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CRAIG.]

Mr. BELL here withdrew his motion for amendment, and

Mr. CRAIG called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. BELL then addressed the House at length in opposition to Mr CRAIG'S amendment, appealing to the gentlemen of the State Rights party to assist him in destroying the viva voce privilege of voting, which he looked upon as a species of Executive whip to be applied to the members on this floor. One of these gentlemen the other day stated that there had been for several years past too much Executive action felt in this Government, and he would appeal to that gentleman, and those who thought with him, to seize this first opportunity of striking a blow at Executive influence. He looked upon this viva voce principle as one of the most powerful engines of Executive influence, and it was essentially important that it should be destroyed. Every man who had been in this House for the last five or six years, must have seen the alarming increase of Executive influence, and Executive patronage, and the alarming control which party discipline and party drill had over the members of this House. He called upon gentlemen of the State Rights party to join him in destroying this dangerous agent of Executive influence.

Mr. PETRIKIN observed that he, as one of the Democratic members of the House who had been alluded to by the gentleman from Tennessee as being acted upon by Executive influence, felt himself called upon indignantly to repel the insinuation. Though he did not pretend to contend with the gentleman from Tennessee in eloquence and argument, he neither admitted him nor any other member to be his superior in firmness of purpose or devotion to the best interests of the country. He had listened to the gentleman while he was charging the party with which he had acted with being operated on by Executive influence, with surprise and indignation, and as far as he himself was concerned, he pronounced the charge to be untrue in point of fact. Mr. P. said he boldly declared it to be his belief that the viva voce principle of voting was the true Republican principle, and that the man who feared openly to express to his constituents all his votes, was not fit to be a Representative in Congress; he should be thrust out of the hall. Mr. P. said that the first motion he ever made, when he first came here, fresh from his native State of Pennsylvania, was to establish this viva voce principle of voting. He was not listened to, and perhaps it was because he was not in the habit of occupying the time of the House in brawling speeches; but he had made the motion because the principle he sought to establish prevailed in the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The representatives of the people there are too proud (Mr. P. said) to skulk behind the ballot boxes. No; they never fear to let their constituents know in what way they give their votes. What! (said Mr. P.) am I, and the party with which I act, under Executive influence? Are we under any other influence than that of our constituents. No, sir; I retort the charge, and ask if it is not disappointed ambition—the mortification of a defeated party, which powerfully influences those who now seek to destroy the viva voce principle? I ask if it is not the coward fear of walking up to the chalk, and openly proclaiming their votes to their constituents, that operates on them? I do not say (continued Mr. P.) that they are operated on by such influences; but I do say, that it is as fair for us to make such charges against them, as for them to charge us with being under Executive influence. Sir, (said Mr. P.) the charge made by the gentleman from Tennessee, is equivalent to a charge of perjury and fraud—of treason to our constituents—and I therefore indignantly repel it.

Mr. PICKENS observed that, as he had been particularly appealed to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] he desired to make a very few remarks on the topics to which he had alluded. He [Mr. BELL] appealed to those gentlemen who announced the sentiment on this floor that there had been, heretofore, too much Executive action in this Government, and besought them to aid him in destroying one of the most powerful engines of Executive influence; and asked where that rule containing the viva voce principle of voting had its origin? Mr. P. took pride in answering the gentleman's question. The first time he (Mr. P.) recollected that the rule was introduced, was in the session of 1834 and 1835, when it was considered by the most intelligent and patriotic men in the country, that there was too much Executive action on the Government. It was when the gentleman himself was in the SPEAKER'S chair, that the party of the Executive, with which he acted, and of which he was the acknowledged head, had that tremendous majority here, which seemed destined then to sweep over all the dearest rights of the country. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] then acted in concert with that great party whose strong organization trampled, without remorse, over a vanquished minority. He recollected those times well, and felt the power of the organization which the gentleman from Tennessee was then supposed to support. He is the last man that ought to ask when this viva voce question was introduced. I voted at that time, said Mr. P. against this viva voce principle of voting, preferring the old fashioned Republican principle of voting by ballot, and when I am called upon to vote on this subject, I shall vote for that principle again—but I shall not do it for the reasons the gentleman has offered. Does he suppose that I am to be overawed by Executive influence? Does he suppose that I am governed by any other principle than the interests of my constituents? Was there not an influence now much more to be dreaded than that of the Executive on the members of this House? We have had, said he, a convention lately, organized under a combination of three powerful and dangerous influences, one of which was that of the banks' interests, that boded much more danger to the people of this country than any the gentleman had alluded to. Sir, that party organization, produced by such a convention, he looked upon as more terrible in its sway, at this juncture, than any other. Mr. P. said that he would always vote for the ballot system, because he believed it to be the most republican; but he thought it a direct insult to this House to suppose that there would be members here who would be mean enough to give their votes one way under one system of voting, and another way under another. He remembered the scenes of the last night of the session of '34–'35, when the three million appropriation was under consideration, and the conduct of the gentleman from Tennessee, then the head of the great Jackson party in this House, on that occasion, and he thought that the gentleman was the last man who ought ever to talk of Executive influence. He trembled when he thought what might arise from extraneous influences brought to bear upon the independence of this House. As far as the iron sway of Executive control is concerned, thank God! we have the prospect of a change. We have principles avowed, embracing the great doctrines of the Constitution. We have a prospect of reform and regeneration. It is folly and madness to attempt to reform this Government by men. You must have great measures. If you wish to strike at the accumulation of power in this Government, or in the Executive, strike at the fiscal action of the Government: reform that, and you reform men. The most we now have to dread is from those moneyed combinations throughout the country, connected with conventions for political purposes, calculated to bring down the independence of individuals and of this House at their mercy, and to absorb all society in one consolidated interest for the benefit of the few, and at the expense of the many.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he, too, had the honor of being a member of this House five years ago, when this proposition, that all elections of officers by the House should be made viva voce, was introduced; and he had the further honor of participating in the debates on that subject. So important did he deem this rule, which his colleague [Mr. HOFFMAN] proposed to exclude from the code, that he would vote against the adoption of the entire code unless this viva voce provision were retained. Nor would he consent to adopt the very liberal and magnanimous suggestion of his colleague, when he told us that we might now adopt all but the eleventh rule, and then introduce the viva voce provision as an independent proposition. He knew well what the consequence would be if this course were adopted. Days, weeks, and, peradventure, months, would be wasted here in the discussion of this proposition, and no decision would be made till after the elections should have been had, which gave the rule a practical character. He meant the election of Clerk, Printer, and all the other officers of the House. It was, indeed, a great favor on the part of his colleague, to give us the privilege of adopting a rule after the mischief against which it was designed to provide was perpetrated.

Sir, said Mr. V. are we wiser than our fathers? Did they not deem it important, with a view to our accountability, to provide by a sacred constitutional provision, that "the yeas and nays of the members of either House, on any question, should, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal?" Upon every question, then, that comes before us in our legislative capacity, no matter how insignificant, one-fifth of this House can hold up the other four-fifths to the gaze of their constituents. Was it, then, in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution to skulk under the ballot, when we entered upon the great and responsible work of electing officers for this House, even to the office of Speaker? It had been said that the people of this country, our constituents, voted by ballot, and that they regarded this, not only as their privilege, but their right, and that the Commoners of England were now contending for this great principle. All this was very true; but did not gentlemen see, in reference to this question, a manifest difference between voting in an individual, and in a representative capacity. When the people undertook to exercise the great and invaluable right of suffrage, they entered upon a work of their own; they were then doing their own business, and no one had a right to inquire how they executed that business. But every vote we gave here, we gave in a representative capacity. We were the creatures of our creators, and who but our constituents were our creators? We were agents, and who but the people were our principals? Responsibility from the agent to the principal was dictated by every consideration of regard for integrity and justice; and he would enter his protest against an innovation which lost sight of the great principle, that it was right and important that our doings here should be open, daylight doings, such as our constituents could see, either for praise or condemnation. He never could, under these views, consent to expunge the 11th rule.

Mr. WELLER did not intend to detain the House long with the few remarks he was about to make. He considered the question to be so simple, that but little needed to be said to illustrate it; and therefore, what he was about to say, would refer principally to his own course on this occasion. He intended, as long as he remained a Representative of the people, that they should see the manner in which he sustained himself in his representative capacity, for he was not afraid to let his constituents be the judges of his conduct here. Nay, he was anxious that they should know the manner in which he discharged his duty to them, as he would disdain to act as their agent, unless his conduct should meet with their fullest approbation. He who acts as an agent, (said Mr. W.) should be accountable to his principal; and, therefore, the records of this House should show how the agents of the people discharged the trusts confided to them. He stood here neither under Executive influence, nor under the influence of banks. He thanked God he had no influences to operate on him but the influences of those who sent him here; and with them he would always be ready to make a prompt settlement of their mutual accounts. Why should it be said that those who prefer the viva voce system of voting were under Executive influence? He did not fear the Executive, or that he would attempt an improper influence over the members of this House. If there was such a man on this floor, let him avow it. He did not believe that this Executive or his predecessor was a tyrant or usurper. He knew that it had been so charged in the columns of a corrupt press, but the people of the country had pronounced the charge to be false and unfounded. He was under no such influence himself—he stood here as a Representative of the people, fearing no influence whatever, and he was not to be deterred from the course his judgment approved, by violent poundings on the desks or a flourish of arms. There might be men here who possessed more physical power than himself, and, by pounding of desks and violent gesticulation, might attract more notice; but these appliances would never deter him from the course his judgment approved. He repeated, that he was under no influence either of the Executive or of the banks, and therefore wished every vote he gave to be openly proclaimed to the whole world.

Mr. BRIGGS said a few words in reply to Mr. VANDERPOEL, and referred to the cases in the Constitution where the ballot system of voting was prescribed, arguing, from thence, that that system was more in accordance with Republican principles and was sanctioned by the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. CRAIG said, he did not comprehend the applicability of the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,]—the remark that the Executive held up a whip over this House. By what part of the Executive was it held up? Was it by the President, or some of his subordinates—the heads of Departments, or by what other branch of the Executive? For his own part, (said Mr. C.) he was unconscious of any such influence as that indicated by the figure of "the whip," except that which came from his constituents. To them, and to them alone, he acknowledged himself to be responsible. The constituent body, and they alone, had a right to inflict lashes upon the members of this House. The members of this House were the mere agents of the people who had elected them, and sent them here as their Representatives. By consequence, it was the right of the people to know all their actings and doings in this hall. How could the people approve or condemn, of our deeds were concealed from them?

Mr. C. further said, there was but one class of the community in whose political honesty he had much confidence—that was that great class made up of the agriculturists, mechanics, manufacturers; in a word, that great class who lie at the foundation of society, and whose labors supply the fruits upon which we all live, and are made comfortable. Every day's experience and observation seemed but to confirm him in the opinion that there was no way of preserving our Republican institutions but by keeping the conduct of the members of this House fully open to the inspection of the people. They, in the mass, are honest—they are virtuous—they have no interest in error, and they will not knowingly permit their liberties to be bartered away under Executive influence, or in any other way. What other motive can suggest the secret mode of voting by ballot, instead of the open mode, "viva voce," but a wish to conceal our acts from our constituents? It is not the dread of responsibility to the Executive, but of responsibility to the constituent body, that induces a preference of the secret mode.

Let, said Mr. C. the idea generally obtain that the House of Representatives may conceal themselves from the view of their constituents, and, in his best judgment, the way will have been paved to the downfall of popular liberty.

At the polls each individual voter stands as one of the independent elements of Government—irresponsible to any person or authority whatsoever. The mode of voting in the primary elections may therefore be supported by many strong arguments, but not one of these arguments is applicable to the Representative. He is an agent, and responsible to his employers. The voter at the polls is independent, and ought, it might be said, to have the means, if he wished to do so, of concealing for whom he had voted.

Formerly, the mode of electing officers in the Legislature of Virginia was by ballot; but recently, in a change of the constitution of that State, that mode had been repudiated. At this time, all elections, whether in the Legislature or among the people, are conducted on the viva voce mode. This is the favorite mode of that State, and it cannot, it seemed to him, occasion any surprise that her Representatives should be in favor of its adoption here.

After some remarks from Mr. WISE, in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. BYNUM expressed his regret at hearing gentlemen descant in the old way about Executive influence and Executive patronage. He hoped had that the events of the last five or six years would have taught the gentlemen a lesson. What Executive influence did the gentleman from Tennessee allude to? He was the last man on earth who ought to talk on such a subject. That gentleman himself stood on this floor side by side with the dominant party, sustaining Executive influence and Executive power, during the highest excitements of party. These charges have been made time after time, for political effect, for the last five or six years; and never had there been a single charge verified. Sir (said Mr. B.) the idea that we should not vote viva voce, through fear of Executive influence, is ridiculous. The gentleman from Tennessee had mistaken the influence. If there was any lash more than another that a Representative should fear, it was the lash of his constituents, as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CRAIG.] That was the fear; and it was the fear of his constituents, who were not here to watch his course, that made the viva voce principle objectionable to those who wished to misrepresent them. He would confidently ask every member present if he ever knew of any Representative who deserted the interests of his constituents in consequence of Executive influence. What had been the events of the last ten years, and what were the changes in the principles of members that they had witnessed? Had these changes been in favor of the Executive? On the contrary, had not all of them been in Opposition to the Administration. When he first came into Congress there was a majority of thirty or forty in this House in favor of the Administration, but there were influences more potent than that of the Executive at work, by which that majority, before the close of the session, was dwindled down to twenty or thirty. When we arrived here a few years hence, there was an Administration majority of twenty-five or thirty. What changes were there the in favor of the Executive? None, sir. Exactly the reverse. Those who changed, and there were many of them, went against the Executive. At the last election of Speaker, that officer was elected by a majority of thirteen votes; but before the close of that session the Administration party was in the minority. Let me tell gentlemen, said Mr. B. a fact worthy of their notice. Go where you will, there is complaint—loud complaint among the people, that their Representatives have misrepresented their will. Now there was one strong reason why the viva voce principle of voting should be retained; and that is, in this widely extended country the constituents of some of the members, living at a great distance from them, (in some instances two thousand miles,) would find it impossible otherwise to know how they had discharged the trusts confided to them. What is the gentleman about to do? said Mr. B. Is he attempting to do that which will give the people an opportunity of knowing what their Representatives are doing? No, sir; he is for permitting them to vote on the secret principle, in order that they may conceal their votes from those whose agents they are; and some of whom, living at a distance of two thousand miles, may never hear how their votes have been given. Mr. B. said he had heard the charges of Executive corruption and Executive patronage until it had sickened and disgusted every honest man. The people understood the matter; and, notwithstanding the gentlemen who made these charges had been asked again and again to put their finger on a single case of corruption, without being able to do so, the stale charge was still reiterated. Every facility had been offered to gentlemen to bring the truth of their charges to light, if truth existed in them; and yet they were unable to verify a single charge. He had some respect for the gentleman from Tennessee, and therefore he would not apply to him the language which his unfounded charges and insinuations deserved; but he would put it to that gentleman whether it was consistent with his high standing to repeat such charges as Executive corruption and Executive influence, without having at least some foundation for them. The people (said Mr B.) want information, not only of the doings of their own immediate Representatives, but of this whole body. They are the great Conservatives of the nation, though not the false, treacherous Conservatives, who have deserted from the Democratic party. He could say, and he was proud of saying, that never, in the course of his legislative experience, often as he had heard the charges of Executive influence and Executive corruption reiterated here and elsewhere, never had he seen or heard the slightest proof offered to verify the charge. What proof was there of it? Gentlemen had made these charges here, and had repeated them after they had gone home, but the proof was still as far off as ever. The argument of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] with regard to the superior honesty of the people, applied with great force in favor of the viva voce principle of voting. The people are admitted, (said Mr. B.) on all hands, to be more honest than their Representatives, and, therefore, there is the stronger reason why they should have an opportunity of knowing the course they pursue. It was all important that the people should know the votes given by their agents. It was important that they should know not only their principles, but the manner they carried them out by their votes; because in voting, the principles of men are shown. In the State he represented, the people voted by ballot, and it was right and proper that they should do so in their primary assemblies, because they there acted as principals; but in the case of a mere agent, as was a Representative, the principle was different; his vote should be given openly, in order that those whose agent he was might see that his duty was correctly performed. There was another reason in favor of the viva voce method of voting; and that was, the people are much easier deceived than the Executive. He is here at the seat of Government, and can see what the Representatives are doing; but the people at a distance can only know of the votes of their agents through the publications of the day. Gentlemen (Mr. B. said) had quoted English examples in favor of abolishing the viva voce method of voting. Now he was tired of hearing English examples quoted in an American Congress. Were the members of the Congress of the United States a set of subjects? To whom do we owe allegiance, but to the institutions of our country? And why should we fear having our votes proclaimed to the world? The man who was capable of such fear, was a disgrace to the seat he occupied. If gentlemen would look round them, they would see that nine-tenths of those who had changed their positions, had been deserters from the cause of the people, and had not changed their course in consequence of Executive influence. This, said Mr. B. is my opinion, and I am therefore clearly in favor of adopting such a system of voting as will give the people an opportunity of looking into the conduct of their Representatives.

Mr. REYNOLDS having obtained the floor, said he felt a deep interest in this subject. He had bestowed upon it much reflection, and was clearly satisfied it was the proper and correct mode of voting to be observed by all Representatives and agents that were responsible. Each gentleman in this House, he said, knows that he does not act for himself in his official and representative character, but he is here to do the will of those who sent him. He is responsible to his constituents, and to no other power on earth; and, as he is responsible, his official acts ought to be open to the inspection of his constituents in all elections.

To prove, said Mr. R. that this system of voting was the proper and correct mode, he might refer gentlemen to all the new States, and many of those that had formed new constitutions. Experience and enlightened policy have convinced the people of the correctness of this doctrine, and, therefore, the viva voce system has been incorporated into most of the constitutions that have been recently formed or amended. If he was not mistaken, this principle was found in the constitutions of Michigan, Arkansas, Tennessee, North Carolina, Virginia, and other States in this Union. It was also made the rule in our sister Republic, the Government of Texas.

If, said Mr. R. there could exist a doubt in the mind of any one on the policy of this measure, the experience and enlightened views of all these Governments ought to dispel those doubts, and convince every one of the correctness of the doctrine. If this system be not correct, the people at this day, when the science of self-government is better known and more appreciated than at any former period, would soon abandon it, and recur to the old and secret manner of balloting.

In the State of Illinois, this system had been adopted for many years past, and it was found on experience to be not only just and right, but also extremely popular. He believed no Representative of the people of Illinois would attempt a change of this rule in our General Assembly. It was due to the people they or we represent, to spread on the journals our votes in all elections. He hoped the intelligence and good sense of this House would not hesitate one moment in the adoption of this rule of voting, if other great and important subjects were not attached to it. It is saddled with a very "deep water" subject of politics. Some gentlemen had stated that it would assist the Executive influence in this House, which was already too great; others contend that bank influence is as great and even greater than Executive power in the House.

These subjects ought not to weigh on this proposition, and prevent its passage. If this system of voting be correct, the maxim of the ancients ought to apply, "Let justice be done if the heavens should fall."

He could not see in what manner this system could aid either the Executive or the bank influence. Neither influence would operate on him, and he presumed other gentlemen were as independent as he was. It was only the influence of the people that he would regard and bow to; and it was the same with all other Representatives, he supposed.

He disagreed with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and others, that the viva voce system was the best system for the people, and ballot for their Representatives. He thought the reverse was best; that is, ballot for the people, and viva voce for their official agents.

The people, he said, are responsible to no earthly power for their sovereign act of voting. The sovereign power is rightfully lodged with them, and they are, by the forms of our Republican Governments, enabled to exercise that power without any responsibility, except to their own consciences and to the Supreme Being. This being the fact, the people have the undoubted right to vote in any manner that best pleased them. In the ballot system, the voter could exercise his free will and choice better than by viva voce. If he pleased, he need not let any one know his political preferences or choice. It might happen that a voter was in a situation to incur the displeasure of some one, if he should vote viva voce, which by the ballot system he could avoid, and vote his real sentiments without any restraint whatever.

Notwithstanding this view of the subject, many entertained a different opinion. In the State of Illinois the people, as well as their representatives, voted viva voce, and no inconvenience was experienced by the public. No injury would ever be experienced by the people of Illinois, if they remained as free, equal, and independent, as they now were.

The situation, he said, of the Representative was quite different from his elector. He was the creature of the people. He was the offspring and miniature of his constituents. He was always presumed, in theory and practice, to speak their voice and sentiments; and if he did not, he was considered guilty of a breach of political faith, and violated not only the form, but the substance, of our representative system of Government. These statements being admitted by all to be self-evidently true, was it not also just and proper to preserve the evidence and truth of the official acts of the Representative?

It would be idle and nugatory to make the Representative accountable to his constituents, if there were no evidence or proof preserved of his official conduct. The people have a right to have the best evidence of the official acts of their agents, and that was the records and journals of their proceedings. The viva voce system of voting, he considered, was but carrying out the plain, common sense meaning of the Constitution. That instrument compels the vote of each member to be recorded on the journal of the House, when requested by one-fifth of the members present. This was considered one of the most wise provisions of the Constitution; and on practice and experience for more than half a century, it was highly approved by the people. Did not every one observe with what great anxiety the people looked to the journal for the votes of members on all important measures? This, he thought, was a practical and common sense proof of the propriety of the provision in the Constitution.

The same principle and policy, he said, was contained in that instrument, when it prescribes that the proceedings of Congress shall be open and public, with some few exceptions. It was a principle based on these political truths; that the people are sovereign, and their representatives responsible to them; and to record the votes of members in elections by the House, was nothing more nor less than carrying out the above principle of a representative form of Government. An election was often much more important than any other measure, and the people have a right to know what vote their representative had given in one case as well as in the other.

The Constitution, he said, also required a journal of the proceedings of Congress to be kept and published. This journal was a record of the facts, read and corrected every morning. This provision in the Constitution was a strong argument in favor of preserving the votes of members in elections, and publishing them to the world. As he before observed, he felt an interest in the adoption of this system of voting, and he had no particular object to answer in its passage except the common good of the country, and the preservation of a fundamental principle of our Government.

He had the honor to present a similar resolution to the House on the day before Christmas, 1834; and did then, as he now did, support it for the correctness and justice of the principle itself. There was then strong insinuation made, that he introduced it for the advancement of the interests of the printers, Messrs. Blair and Rives, when the fact was, that he scarcely knew either of the gentlemen; and neither then, nor now, had either of them the least influence on him in that transaction. He acted from a conviction that the interests of his constituents required it, and to carry out, in his opinion, their sentiments and wishes on that subject.

The course of no gentleman present surprised him so much as that of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] Judging from his actions and speeches in the House, he would be well pleased to let his constituents know all his official conduct. He does not seem to be willing to be silent on any important political occasion. He would have supposed he would be the first on the list of friends of the viva voce system. He was, however, mistaken, and was sorry for it.

Mr. R. said the gentleman [Mr. WISE] was also, in his opinion, mistaken in supposing the people were the only honest folks in the world. He thought the great body of the people were honest, and he thought their Representatives in Congress were also honest. He did not pretend that the Congressmen here before him were like the angels from heaven; but he believed they were like other human beings, just and honest. If they were dishonest, the ordeal of elections would prove it, and they would be permitted to remain at home. He pretended not to say that every man who was defeated in an election was dishonest. That might be one cause of defeat.

In 1834, the House were not doing much, and he thought a Christmas frolic was nothing amiss; they had one, that lasted for several days. He put the resolution in the hopper like a miller would his corn, but it was not ground out. Although a majority was in its favor, yet it did not pass, as his recollection served him, on account of some of the rule of the House requiring two-thirds of the members to vote for it. He hoped this motion would not meet the same fate—to be lost; but that it would succeed, and this rule be made the standing order of the House forever.

Mr. PROFFIT commenced with a quotation from Shakspeare, which the reporter did not hear. He was surprised, he said, that on a question as to the manner of voting, that the three million appropriation should have been brought up by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS] which he thought had very little to do with the question. He did not know how he should vote on this question; he was in favor of the vivavoce principle of voting, and so were the people of his State; but if he saw that it would benefit his party here in any way, he would assuredly give his vote for the ballot system. He had, however, no concealments to make. He was ready to say now, that whether the vote was taken viva voce or by ballot, he would neither vote for Mr. Garland or for Mr. Blair. He would not vote for Blair any how. His friend from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] had referred to the Harrisburg convention, and said that there was a combination of interests there, one of which was the banking interest. There was one other interest to which the gentleman alluded, without naming it, and he should be obliged to him if he would say what it was. If the gentleman meant the Abolition interest, and a dark insinuation had been thrown out in other quarters that General Harrison was an Abolitionist, he would take this occasion to say that it was a base slander. If the gentleman meant that the Harrisburg convention was under Bank influence, he would further say that that convention was composed of as pure and upright men as ever trod the earth—as pure as any to be found in that hall. But he would ask if there were none of the members of the Administration party who were under bank influence. How many of the present leaders of the Administration party voted for the Bank of the United States? He would name a few of them. Here Mr. P. gave a list of the gentlemen who, he said, voted for the late Bank of the United States, and said he could go on with the list and find more Bank of the United States men among the members of the Administration party than in the Opposition. Then, on the subject of State banks, have we not (said Mr. P.) the messages of '34, '35, and '36, recommending State banks as the best fiscal agents that the Government could employ. The speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, with his innuendoes about combinations of interests, reminded him of the fag end of a Democratic stump speech, delivered to a dozen men in a barn. But the gentleman did not understand his trade; he had left out the very best part of a stump speech, and that was "the silk stockings," "Nick Biddle," "moneyed aristocracy," and "the monster." Why he could make, Mr. P. said, a better stump speech himself. The gentleman might well have fears of the Harrisburg Convention, for he could say that that convention would sweep all before it. Like a fire in a western prairie, it would advance and extend over the whole Union. Mr. P. then gave a list of the States, which he said the Harrisburg convention would bring over to General Harrison; and after speaking of the glories of Tippecanoe, the Thames, and the River Raisin, said there was one combination that he was glad the Whig party had got rid of, and that was the Calhoun combination—the Nullifiers. He was glad, he said, that his party had shaken them off, and that they had no men in their ranks who would desert their posts, because the victory would not enure to their party. Mr. P. after saying that there were a number of the rules, which, in his opinion, required an amendment, moved that the House do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays having been called,

Mr. PROFFIT said that, as the yeas and nays had been called, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. GRIFFIN then renewed the motion for adjournment; and tellers being called for, Messrs. J. GARLAND and LEWIS were appointed; who, on taking the question, reported—ayes 103, noes 79; so—

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, December 21, 1839.

Mr. ROBINSON gave notice that, as soon as it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of A. G. S. White.

Mr. PRESTON gave notice that, at the earliest day it would be in order to do so, he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of General Croghan and General Wool.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, Dec. 21, 1839.

Immediately of the reading of the journal,

Mr. JACKSON of New York rose and said: I observed, in looking over one of the newspapers this morning, that my name was not reported among the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Maine, requesting the SPEAKER to administer the oath to the certificate claimants from the State of New Jersey. I was present, and voted in the negative. I wish to know whether my name is so recorded on the journal.

The CLERK stated that the gentleman's name was recorded in the negative.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked leave to submit the resolution moved by him the other day to appoint a Committee to wait upon the Senate and the President, with a view of obtaining the President's message.

Mr. MITCHELL objected, and the resolution could not be received.

VIVA VOCE VOTING.

On yesterday Mr. HOFFMAN submitted the following resolution, which was the first business in order:

Resolved, That the standing rules and orders of the last House of Representatives, except the 11th rule, be adopted as the rules and order of proceeding of this House for the ensuing ten days; that the rules and orders be referred to a committee, with instructions to report such amendments of the said rules and orders as they may deem expedient.

Mr. CRAIG had moved to strike out of the above resolution the words "except the 11th rule," that being the rule by which members were required to vote for all officers viva voce, and this latter motion was the question pending.

Mr. HUNT referred to the question which had prevented the organization of the House for three weeks, and expressed the opinion that, notwithstanding the delay which that question had occasioned in proceeding to the discharge of the public business, the discussion upon it would have a good effect throughout the country. He urged upon the House the propriety of immediately adopting rules for its government, but opposed the adoption of the rule in relation to viva voce voting. That system of voting, he said, had its origin in another country. He contended that it was introduced into this House for the purpose of enabling the party in the majority to put upon gentlemen the party screws. It had been argued by some gentlemen on this floor that we should adopt this mode of voting to enable our constituents to judge upon all our votes. He agreed with gentlemen that they ought to vote publicly on all the great measures of legislation, but he denied that they aught to do so in the election of officers of this House, who were the mere servants of the House. It might be proper enough to vote publicly on the election of a Speaker, because he occupied a high and exalted station, but he would ask what interest could the people take in the matter, as to who should be the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, or Printer of the House. The people took no interest in this matter, and he could see no reason why the old and long established system of voting by ballot, should be departed from on the present occasion.

Mr. TILLINGHAST would suggest to gentlemen, as it was very desirable that the House should have rules for its government, and as the gentleman from New York had moved to adopt the whole of the rules of the last Congress, except one—one hundred and thirty-eight out of one hundred and thirty-nine; and as there was no objection to these one hundred and thirty-eight rules, that the House should immediately adopt the motion of the gentleman from New York, and then if it was necessary to have such a rule as the 11th, the viva voce rule, any gentleman could move to adopt it, and then they would have rules to govern them in their deliberations upon it, and would have the previous question, too, to cut off debate, if it should become tedious. This, in his view of the matter would be the most proper course to pursue, and he hoped gentlemen would make no objection to this mode of proceeding.

Mr. SALTONSTALL was as anxious as any gentleman in the House, that the body should be organized at the earliest period possible. With regard to the delay in the organization, it was occasioned by the argument of a great constitutional question, and he was willing as one of the minority to take his share of the responsibility of it; for although the question was decided contrary to his feelings and opinions, he believed the argument upon the question would be productive of much good. With regard to the question before the House, he objected to viva voce voting, because it was an innovation on the long established practice of the House. It was also, in his opinion, contrary to the practice of the Constitution, although some gentlemen had held a different opinion here. It was well known that in the Constitution, the word ballot is used in regard to the elction of a Chief Magistrate. When the election of a Chief Magistrate devolves upon this House, the Constitution says it shall be by ballot. Thus it will be seen that in the highest and most important election which this House can make the Constitution says, it shall be by ballot. This being the case, he could not see how gentlemen should hold the opinion that viva voce voting was in consonance with the principles of the Constitution. He admitted that it was proper that the votes of members of this House should be recorded on all public measures, and the Constitution provided for this by declaring that it should be in the power of one-fifth of the members present to call for the yeas and nays. Thus far the Constitution had made provision for public voting, but no farther. With regard to officers of the House, it was a mere incidental matter. When we meet together here we meet as a body of the people, and have the right to make choice of such servants as we please, without being held responsible to the people in regard to this matter. The people care nothing about it, and would never make any inquiry in relation to it. His constituents would never call upon him to know who he voted for as Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, or Printer. There was not a man among his constituents who would catechise him thus; and if there should be one who would do do so, he would freely tell him who he voted for; whether his vote was given by ballot or viva voce. He held that viva voce voting in the House was objectionable, because it had the tendency to effect a party organization; and he contended that there should never be such an organization in the House. The officers of this House should never be the tools of a party. In addition to this, it placed high minded and honorable men in a delicate situation, and subjected them to be held up in the public press as traitors to party. Besides, gentlemen received a great many courtesies from the officers of the House, and it might seem unkind to be voting publicly against those officers, although they might think others more worthy or more capable.

Mr. BELL addressed the House at some length in reply to gentlemen who had spoken on this subject yesterday, and in vindication of his own conduct on several occasions. He contended that the secret ballot in the House was necessary to protect gentlemen on this floor from the influence of the Executive, and prevent them from being made the subservient tools of Executive will and power. But it was still more necessary to protect them from the great central headsman at Washington, whose ire was even more to be dreaded than that of the Executive himself. He had known men on this floor who had the physical courage to march up to the cannon's mouth, yet they had not the courage to brave the denunciations of the party press; they never could be brought up to that sticking point. These men, too, he held, were some of the best men in the country, and he contended that it was necessary to adopt the ballot as a protection to such men as these.

Mr. CUSHING rose to make a few remarks with regard to the adoption or rather the continuation of the rule under discussion; and he did so because, upon referring to the course of gentlemen on this question, he found that those who opposed the adoption of the rule in relation to viva voce voting were his political associates, and those who supported it were the friends of the present Administration and his political opponents, and on this question he differed with his political friends. This question was partly a question of principle, and partly a question of party expediency. If it was merely a question of party expediency, he should doubt with regard to the course to be pursued; he would vote with his party associates; but he regarded it as a question of principle, and as a question of principle it must override party expediency. In the first place, with regard to the question of principle, he conceived the members of the Congress of the United States to be public agents, and as public agents, bound to let their acts be known to their principals. We are the agents of the people. The members of the Senate of the United States are the agents of the States. The members of the House of Representatives are the agents of the people of the States. That he held to be the fundamental principle of our Government recognised by the Constitution. Sir, what are Representatives? They are men who represent others—men who speak on behalf of those whom they represent. We are here to represent our constituency. Well, who are the constituency? Those who appoint and constitute. Our constituency are the people who appoint and constitute us their agents and representatives in this House and our votes here are not our own votes, but they are simply the votes of those who sent us here. But his colleague had asked if our constituents had not sent us here free agents. Undoubtedly they did, but they sent us from a previous conviction of the harmony of our sentiments with their sentiments; and, in our votes here, we must represent their sentiments, otherwise we are not their representatives. He repeated that we were the representatives of our constituents merely, speaking their voice; and that voice should be a public voice, not a secret, not a clandestine voice, as it were, but a public voice, in the face of the world, and in the face of heaven. Such was the general principle; but he held it to be the constitutional principle also. The Constitution of the United States, in the fifth section of the first article, provides that "the yeas and nays of the members of either House, on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." This was the general principle of the Constitution applicable to all cases prescribed by the Constitution, excepting one single case, which is in the election of a President of the United States, which, in another clause, the Constitution says shall be by ballot. That insertion of an express exception, was an implication of an exclusion in all other cases. The Constitution makes a single exception as to the vote by ballot, in the case of a President of the United States; and this he held to be an exclusion of that mode in regard to all other votes. Perhaps he would be told by some gentlemen that there was no express provision in the Constitution as to the mode in which the officers of this House were to be elected. But, sir, is not the choice of officers of this House a vote? Do we not vote for a Clerk? Certainly we do; and as a general principle in the Constitution, that vote should be a public vote. In fact it had been a public vote on more occasions than one in this House. It had been assumed by the gentleman from New York, and by his colleague, that the introduction of the viva voce voting into this House was an innovation on existing usages, which was to be apprehended. He, however, did not fear innovations. He had heard it said that monarchs dreaded change; the people never did. He believed in change, in innovation, in reform, in improvement. This was the spirit of a Democracy, the spirit of a Republic, and it was not to be dreaded. We must change, we must improve, we must innovate, and he was not to be frightened with this cry of innovation. Time is changing, men are changing, the world is changing, and we must change with the changes of the times; we must advance with the changes of the age, or the tide of public improvement will leave us behind high and dry, and instead of innovating to do right, we will be innovating to do wrong, by refusing to keep up with these improvements. Then whether this was an innovation or not, he was not to be alarmed by it; but he denied that it was so much of an innovation as some gentlemen apprehended; for he could show gentlemen case after case in which a Clerk had been appointed by resolution on which the yeas and nays might have been called. There were a multitude of cases where officers of this House had been appointed by resolution, and it would be competent, at any time, to move a resolution to appoint a certain officer, if there was no rule to the contrary, and one-fifth of the members might call the yeas and nays upon it, which would make it as much of a public vote as by any other means. But even if this mode of voting viva voce was an innovation, he was prepared to justify that innovation. What is the objection to it? We are told by gentlemen that the vote by ballot is necessary to secure members against external influences, and from Executive influence. But it would seem, from the remarks of gentlemen, that this external influence was not merely Executive influence; for his colleague, and the gentleman from Tennessee, had very justly told the House that Executive influence was in many cases exerted through party organization, which organization constituted one of the greatest tyrannies under which men in this country labored. But in regard to all these objections, if it was necessary that we should have a ballot in order that men might give a secret vote for officers of this House to free them from Executive oppression, he put it to gentlemen to say if the same argument would not be good to exclude from the Constitution the right of having votes taken on all measures by yeas and nays. If it was important that we should have a secret vote for a Clerk or any other officer, to protect men, was it not ten times more important to protect them in regard to public measures? He contended, therefore, that the principle of Democracy, and the principle of the Constitution of the United States, was public voting—voting in the face of the House, in the face of the world, in the face of our constituents, who are to judge of our votes, and see whether they are in conformity with the declarations which we made at the polls. All our votes here, not only in regard to measures, but in regard to men, ought to be public and open, so that every man might see and judge of them. But it had been said by his colleague that this election of officers was a mere incidental matter; that the people cared nothing about the matter as to who the servants of this House were to be; and his colleague had said that his constituents would never make any inquiries of him in regard to this matter. He agreed with his colleague, that his constituents might perhaps never inquire of him whom he voted for as officers of the House; but, with regard to this being an unimportant question, he would ask his colleague if there were not hundreds and thousands of questions quite as unimportant, on which one-fifth of the members of the House called for the yeas and nays, and their names were recorded upon those questions and perpetuated upon your journals. The gentleman from N. York [Mr. HUNT] says that the officers of this House are mere servants, and it was, therefore, of little moment how they were elected; but, sir, the Constitution associates these officers of the House in terms of expression, which, perhaps, were not present to the gentleman's mind when he spoke of them. The Constitution says "the House of Representatives shall choose a Speaker and other officers." Mr. C. asked the House, which had been struggling for three weeks to effect an organization—he asked the country which had been looking to us with anxious eyes, if the choice of a Speaker was not an important question? Yet the Speaker is one of about other officers in regard to the manner of whose election the Constitution makes no express provision. He held that the election of Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and other officers, being associated in the same clause in the Constitution with the Speaker was no trivial question, but was a question of the first magnitude—one of the highest personal questions which come before the House, except when the House was exercising judicial power in impeachments.

The gentleman from New York who had introduced this question, had referred to the practice in other nations, and to the fact that the introduction of the system of voting by ballot in Great Britain had been hailed by the friends of popular rights; and the inference he presumed to be drawn from this was, that as that system had been hailed by the friends of popular rights in England, it must have a tendency to advance popular rights in this country. In regard to this, however, he would take issue with the gentleman. He denied that the ballot in this country had a tendency to advance popular rights. We were too apt in this country to look to England for precedents. We are too prone to inquire what is the practice in the mother country, forgetting that that country is a monarchy, and her Parliament frequently overruled by an aristocracy. When he went to that country for precedents, he must be sure of the ground on which he stood in regard to those precedents. He would beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen to the ballot system of England, which had been hailed by the friends of popular rights. That system was the ballot system at the polls. No one proposed that the members of the House of Commons should vote secretly. The members of that body vote publicly as we do. But the ballot system which has advanced popular rights in England, is the ballot system at the polls. The population of England is made up, principally, of two classes, namely, of tradespeople, and tenants who reside on the lands of the aristocracy, and the system of ballot was introduced to protect them; to protect a tradesman from losing the custom of persons whom he might offend in voting publicly, and to protect the tenant from having a written ejectment served on him the morning after an election, if he voted against the wishes of his aristocratic landlord.

But there is another country, the customs of which show us that one mode of voting may be most condusive to public liberty in a monarchy, while another mode may be most conducive to public liberty in a Republic or a Democratic Government That country was France. In France, not only the votes at the popular elections are given by ballot; but the votes in the Chamber of Deputies are by ballot, and not recorded by yeas and nays, as they are in this House. Well, sir, what is the reason of this difference in practice between this country and France? It must be familiar to every gentleman. Whilst, by the Constitution of the United States, all Executive officers are excluded from this House, it is known that in the House of Commons in England, and the Chamber of Deputies in France, Executive officers are admitted, and hold seats there—officers of the army, of the navy, and ministers of State, occupy seats there. These men, therefore, who are liable to be disgraced, and have their offices taken from them by the mere word of the king, need the ballot system as a protection; and in such a body thus organized, the ballot may be most conducive to popular liberty. But did such a state of things exist in this country? No member of this House could be deprived of his commission, or of any of his privileges, at the mere will of the Executive. He was not responsible to the Executive, but to his constituents. This was the difference between a republic and a monarchy.

He would repeat, that if this question was a mere question of party expediency, he might desire to vote with his political friends. In fact, such were the influences of party, that he might perhaps be induced to go for this motion to restore the ballot system if he could make sure that any thing was to be gained by it; and he might come afterwards into the House, and say that he had voted against his convictions of what he believed to be the true principles, but was induced to give them up in the expectation of obtaining a great public good. But he would now say that he did not see what good was to be accomplished by it. Last year, when he did sacrifice his convictions at the instance of his party friends—when he did vote upon this question as a matter of expediency, he found that the viva voce vote was carried by a large majority, and he could not anticipate that there would be any change at the present time. But suppose there is a change, what object is to be gained by this change? Although it was not distinctly stated, he supposed it might be inferred that there were some gentlemen who wished to vote with one party secretly, while they acted with another party publicly. Is that the object which gentlemen desire to effect? Is it their object, that while some gentlemen appear to the world to belong to one party, they are in fact secretly voting with another party. If that was the object, he could not yield to such considerations. It seemed to him that gentlemen misstated the operation of this thing. It may be viewed in respect to persons attached to the Administration, or it may be to persons elected by the Opposition. Now, sir, to whom is the individual attached to the Administration to look, if he departs from the Administration? He is to look to his constituents. Individuals about leaving the Administration, which has the power of conferring upon them honors and distinctions, must look to their constituents, and endeavor to retain their confidence and favor. Then the matter was between the representative and his constituents, and his vote should be a public vote. The constituents should be able to see the votes of their Representatives and compare them with their professions before they come here. He held, therefore, that the system of viva voce voting in this House was most congenial with our institutions, and with the Constitution of the country. He remembered a remark of a Senator in olden times, which was applicable to this case. The person alluded to had erected a magnificent dwelling house in a very public situation, and this was denominated by some of his acquaintances an ostentatious act. Not so, replied he; I only placed my house under the eye of my constituents, so that they might see me in my daily walks, and judge of my whole life. That was a true answer. We are the Representatives of the people, and should give our votes in the face of the people. The people have a right to be satisfied with regard to all the votes of their Representatives. This was his doctrine, and in addition to this, he deprecated, as a party man, and as a Whig, the association of their party with an unpopular side of the question. Then, as a question of party expediency, he contended that the Whigs ought to go for the viva voce system, because that was the popular principle.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had not supposed that a constitutional lawyer would have contended that the viva voce mode of voting was the constitutional mode. He thought, if any inferences could be drawn from the Constitution, they were decidedly in favor of the ballot. It was well known that the liberal party in England had long contended for the vote by ballot; and why? Because the influence exercised by the aristocracy and the rich landholders renders voting there a mere form, a mockery. And though these influences were not felt here, there was an unseen influence pervading this hall—the influence of party drill and party organization—that Moloch upon whose altar we are offering our first born daily, and whose grasp was quite as strong and as merciless as the despotism of the old world. If in England men were deterred from voting in accordance with their sentiments, by the fear of their landlords, he would ask if, in this House, there were not men who were deterred from voting as their consciences dictated, by the fear of the denunciations of the party press? The writ of ejectment would be issued as promptly in one case of disobedience, as in the other. If the ballot was necessary in England and France to protect the voter from the vengeance of the aristocracy or the sovereign, it was just as necessary here; we had only to put the President in place of the Crown, and the necessity was the same. He thought the ballot was a good system; and it was the old and long-tried system, having been the only one in practice until within the last year.

Mr. ALFORD then addressed the House, with a view, as he said, to get them to stop talking and proceed to business. His impulses were periodical. Last Saturday afternoon he had appealed to them to put a stop to discussion, and the appeal was followed by the election of a Speaker. It was Saturday evening again, and he would now appeal to them to proceed to complete the organization of the House. For his own part, he had been ever taught to believe that the viva voce mode of voting was the most Republican in principle, and he was sorry to see his friends opposing it. He thought that the arguments they used against it were more those of policy than principle, and that the onlyy looked on one side of the question. Perhaps one or two individuals; who had not the courage to avow their sentiments openly, might, under the shelter of the ballot box, go against the Administration candidates; but might not ten or a dozen professing Whigs, under the same shelter, go over to the enemy, while they would take good care the Executive should be informed how they voted? For his own part, he thought that the Executive possessed as many charms as terrors, and preferred the open manly mode of voting viva voce. Mr. A. concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. STANLY rose amid loud cries of "order, order." He said he was not to be put down in this manner, and he would speak, notwithstanding their cries of order. He then went on to say that bargains were making in this Hall for the division of the spoils: that one of the candidates for the votes of the Administration party as printer had offered the other ten or fifteen thousand dollars to withdraw his pretensions. He then adverted to Mr. PICKENS's allusion last evening to the Harrisburg nomination, and began reading an extract from the "Emancipator," in elucidation of his remarks, when he was called to order by Mr. COOPER of Georgia, who objected to reading any extracts from that paper. Mr. STANLY then said he would have the passage inserted in his speech when it was printed. He said that the Harrisburg nomination, in the beautiful language of his friend [Mr. PROFFIT] from Indiana, would be like wildfire in the prairies—it would advance and extend until it embraced the great portion of the Union in its influence. He closed, by saying to the friends of the Administration: "Mourn, sinners, mourn; your time is at hand, and if you do not retrench and reform, an abused and insulted people will soon call you to account.

The previous question on Mr. CRAIG's amendment being seconded, the main question was ordered, and the yeas and nays having been called for, the vote was—yeas 142, nays 87.

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—87.

The question then recurring on Mr. HOFFMAN'S resolution, as amended, it was carried without a division.

Mr. BYNUM offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House will now proceed forth with to the election of Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Assistant Doorkeeper, and Public Printer, for the present Congress.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. TURNEY called for the previous question, which was seconded by the House.

Mr. STANLY asked for the reading of a law in relation to the election of Public Printer.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia objected to the reading, it being out of order.

The previous question was then seconded by the House—ayes 115, noes not counted.

Mr. EVERETT asked of the CHAIR if a call of the House would be in order.

The SPEAKER decided it not in order.

The main question was then ordered, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. EVERETT, it now being in order, moved a call of the House; and upon this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 137, nays 76.

On motion of Mr. GRAVES, the House, by unanimous consent, proceeded to call the absentees, and dispensed with other preliminary proceedings.

The absentees having been called over, Mr. ROGERS of South Carolina, and Mr. HAWES of Kentucky, who were absent from indisposition, were excused by the House.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with; and the House then proceeded, viva voce, to the election of Clerk.

Mr. DROMGOOLE nominated HUGH A. GARLAND.

Mr. CORWIN nominated MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE.

Mr. HOPKINS nominated RICHARD C. MASON.

The CHAIR having appointed Messrs. CORWIN, DROMGOOLE, HOPKINS, and BRIGGS, as tellers, to ascertain the result, reported that

The whole number of votes was -	231
Necessary to a choice - - -	116
HUGH A. GARLAND received -	118

FOR RICHARD C. MASON—Messrs. W. B Campbell, Colquitt, J. Garland, Gentry, G ggin, Hopkins, Mercer, and W. Thompson—8.

Mr. GARLAND having been elected Clerk, was qualified as such by the SPEAKER, by taking the oath of office.

The House then proceeded to the election, viva voce, for Sergeant-at-Arms, the same gentlemen acting as tellers.

Mr. CRAIG nominated Mr RODERICK DORSEY.

Mr. GRIFFIN nominated Dr. WM. JONES.

The tellers reported the following result:

Whole number of votes - -	217
Necessary to a choice - -	109
RODERICK DORSEY received - -	141
Dr. WM. JONES - - -	76

The following is a statement of the vote:

FOR RODERIC DORSEY.—Messrs. Adams, Alford, J. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, W. O. Butler, Bynum, J. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, M. A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, Davee, J. Davis, J. W. Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, F. Thomas, P. F. Thomas, W. Thompson, J. Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, D. D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, H. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, S. Williams, and Mr. Speaker—141.

FOR WILLIAM JONES.—Messrs. J. W. Allen, S. H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, A. Brown, S. H. Butler, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clarke, J. Cooper, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, E. Davies, G. Davis, Dillet, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, James, Ch. Johnston, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Palen, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Tr. Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, P. J. Wagner, J. White, T. W. Williams, L. Williams, Wise, and Cushing—76.

Mr. DORSEY having been elected, came forward to the Chair and was sworn by the SPEAKER.

Mr. EVERETT said, as the House was now organized by the election of a Speaker and Clerk, he would suggest the propriety of postponing all further action under the resolution for the election of officers, and pass the usual resolution informing the Senate that we were organized; and concluded by making the motion for postponement.

Mr. RHETT said nothing could be gained by the postponement, as the Senate was not now in session.

Mr. C. JOHNSON hoped the motion would prevail, as the House had been in session long enough.

The question was taken on said proposition by tellers—Messrs. LEWIS and S. WILLIAMS acting as such—ayes 107, nays 86.

Mr. EVERETT then proposed the following order, which was read and adopted:

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform that body that a quorum of the House has assembled—that R. M. T. HUNTER, one of the Representatives from the State of Virginia, has been elected Speaker thereof, and that it is now ready to proceed to business, and that the Clerk do go with the said message.

On motion, the House then adjourned till Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, December 23, 1839.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, informing them that a quorum had assembled, and that ROBERT M. T. HUNTER, a Representative from the State of Virginia, was elected Speaker; and that they were ready to proceed to business.

Also, that the House had concurred in the joint resolution of the Senate, that a joint committee of the two Houses be appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive any communications he might make; and that Messrs. EVERETT and RAMSEY were appointed said committee on the part of the House.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of James Sevier, on file in the Clerk's office, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. YOUNG gave notice that he would, as soon as the Senate could proceed to Legislative business, ask leave to introduce bills of the following titles:

1. A bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands of the United States, and for other purposes.

2. A bill authorizing the President to cause the reserved lead mines belonging to the United States, in the several States and Territories, to be sold as other public lands.

3. A bill for the relief of the widow and minor heirs at law of Samuel Hill, deceased.

4 A bill for the relief of Epraim Sprague.

5. A bill for the relief of James Dutton.

6 A bill for the relief of Jane Waller.

7. A bill for the relief of Thomas H. Owen, John W. Skidmore and others.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of Thomas S. Hinds and Jacob Leshe, praying that commissioners be appointed by Congress to examine and report on the sites at the Grand Rapids of the Great Wabash as suitable for a national armory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of Capt. Aaron Fitzgerald for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Samuel Crapier, praying to be allowed a pension for a disability incurred during the last war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Mary French, widow of Benjamin French, who was a Revolutionary soldier, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented the petition of George W. Paschal; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAPPAN presented to the Senate the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Cincinnati, recommending the passage of a law by Congress granting to Madame America Vespucci the right to enter, at the minimum price, ten sections of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial from citizens of New Jersey, praying for the establishment of a port of entry at Indian Key, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of the administrator of William Sanford, praying to be allowed the commutation due said deceased as a captain in the army of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the memorial of the Board of Health of the city of Washington, praying for the establishment of a National Hospital and Lunatic Asylum at that place; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of the heirs of William Bailey, a major in the army of the Revolution, praying to be allowed bounty land and commutation; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of William D. Ferguson, praying for a confirmation of certain land claims; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Gen. Mathew Arbuckle, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. WALKER,

Ordered, That the several memorials of the Legislature of Mississippi, presented at the last session of Congress, for the establishment of certain designated post routes, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him of the organization of the two Houses, reported that they had attended to the duty confided to them, and that the President informed them that he would send a message in writing to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial of the officers of the Fourth regiment of Artillery, praying for equalization of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of William Tumey for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of a number of citizens of the county of Lincoln, State of Missouri, praying for an amendment of the pre-emption laws; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of John H. Mackintosh; which, with the papers now on file, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of John S. Wilson, praying permission to enter a quarter section of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. C. also offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to Abel Pennington, of Captain A. Byram's company of North Alabama volunteers, serving in Florida, for a horse, shot by order of the commanding officer in January, 1838.

Mr. LUMPKIN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail stage route from Clarksville, Habersham county, Ga. to Asheville, N. C. via the town of Clayton, in Rabun county, Ga. and the town of Franklin, in Macon county, N. C. And also a weekly mail route, to be carried on horseback, from the town of Lafayette, in Walker county, to the town of Salem, Dade county, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. L. in connection with the above, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, recommending the establishment of said roads.

On motion by Mr. PRENTISS,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Ira H. Day be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of John A. Piatt be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALL gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to introduce the following bills:

1. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes."

2. A bill to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin; and to prevent the bringing into the United States or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin.

Mr. CLAYTON gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Irvine Shubrick.

Mr. BENTON offered the following joint resolution, which was considered, and, by unanimous consent, agreed to:

Resolved, That two chaplains, of different denominations, be elected to serve during the present Congress, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

The Senate then went into an Executive session, and afterwards

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, December 23, 1839.

Mr. HOOK inquired how his name was recorded on the journal on the amendment to insert the viva voce rule.

The CLERK replied that it was recorded in the negative.

Mr. HOOK stated that he had voted in favor of that rule.

The Secretary of the Senate being introduced, informed the House that the Senate had appointed Messrs. WRIGHT and ALLEN a committee to join such committee as might be appointed by the House, to wait on the President and inform him that both Houses of Congress were duly organized, and ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make.

Mr. RAMSEY moved a resolution to appoint a committee from the House to join the committee of the Senate, to wait on the President and inform him that both Houses of Congress were organized, and ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make; which was considered and adopted, and Messrs. EVERETT and RAMSEY were appointed a committee on the part of the House.

The CHAIR then announced that the first business in order, under the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] would be the election of a Doorkeeper.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana then nominated Mr. JESSE E Dow for the office of Doorkeeper.

Mr. BRIGGS nominated Mr. FOLLANSBEE.

Mr. LEWIS nominated Mr. JOHN HOUSTON.

The SPEAKER then appointed Messrs. J. W. DAVIS, BRIGGS, CASEY, and GRIFFIN, tellers, when the vote was taken and declared as follows:

For Mr. Jos. FOLLANSBEE	- -	130
" " JESSE E. DOW	- -	73
" " JOHN HOUSTON	- -	15

So Mr. FOLLINSBEE was declared duly elected.

Mr. CRAIG moved a resolution that JOHN W. HUNTER be appointed Assistant Doorkeeper, and WM J. MCCORMICK be appointed Postmaster of the House; which was considered and adopted.

The CHAIR announced the next business in order to be the election of a Printer for the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and the roll was twice called.

Excuses were then offered for the following gentlemen; Messrs. BEIRNE, GRINNELL, JENIFER, MERCER, and WORTHINGTON.

Mr. STANLY then sent to the CHAIR the following resolution, which was read for information

Resolved, That the printing and binding of the House of Representatives shall be furnished by contract; notice of which shall be given in the public prints of Washington city for ——— days, it being made a condition that the work shall be done in the City of Washington; and the contract shall, in each case, be given to the lowest bidder, whose bid shall be accompanied with proper testimonials of the ability of the bidder to fulfil his contracts.

The CHAIR said the resolution was not in order, the House being now engaged in the execution of the order of the House of Saturday, it being about to proceed to the election of a Printer.

Mr. STANLY then moved to suspend the order for the purpose of offering this resolution. He had understood that the House might probably save $100,000 by giving out the printing by contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina thought it was perfectly competent for the House to give any direction they pleased to this resolution, and that it would be perfectly in order for the House to suspend the order, lay it on the table, or postpone it indefinitely.

The CHAIR said the resolution could only be introduced by a motion to suspend the order.

Mr. ANDERSON of Kentucky then moved the following as a substitute for Mr. STANLY's resolution:

Resolved, That the execution of the order made on the 21st instant, in relation to the election of a public Printer, be postponed for the present; and that the whole subject of the public printing be referred to a select committee of five members, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of letting out the printing to the lowest bidder, who shall furnish satisfactory evidence of his fidelity and ability to execute it.

Resolved, further, That said committee inquire into the expediency of separating the public printing from the newspaper presses of the country; and that, if expedient, they report the most practicable plan of having the printing executed.

Resolved, also, That said committee report to this House, what amount of money can be saved to the Government by the adoption of either of the plans above suggested, and until said committee shall make report, all further proceedings in relation to a public Printer be suspended.

Mr. STANLY accepted this as a modification of his motion.

Mr. ANDERSON only desired to say a word in explanation of the motive which had induced him to offer this proposition. He was not now in possession of the facts which would enable him to speak with accuracy as to the public printing; but it had been suggested to him, by gentlemen of experience, that the public printing of Congress amounted to about $300,000, and that the profits arising from it were about thirty-three and a third per cent. He found, by an examination of the laws, that the prices of printing had been fixed many years ago, and it was now a material consideration for the House to examine and see if the prices of material and labor had not been considerably reduced. He would not vote to embarrass the legitimate operations of the Government, and he would always vote for a proper, economical expenditure of money.

Mr. VANDERPOEL here rose to a point of order.

Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS. The gentleman must reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then submitted the following point of order: "The previous question having been ordered, and the order of the House partly executed, the main question not being debatable, a motion to postpone the further order of the House cannot be debatable."

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Kentucky was in order.

Mr. ANDERSON said he had been informed by a gentleman from Massachusetts that the price of printing in that State had been reduced nearly one-half within a few years past, and he thought it but right that this matter should at least be examined into by a committee. It was the duty of a Republican Government to retrench expenditures as much as possible; and he trusted measures would be taken, at the present session, to retrench all the expenditures of Government.

Mr. EVERETT, from the committee appointed, in conjunction with a committee of the Senate, to wait on the President, and inform him that both Houses of Congress were duly organized and ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make, made report that they had performed that duty, and that the President had informed them that he would send a Message, in writing, to the two Houses, on to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said that he had been denouncing, for the last two years, the Administration party, for looking one way and rowing another; for continually talking of economy, while they never practised it; and he wanted now to see them come up to the scratch, and show that they, the Jeffersonian Democratic party, were sincere in their professions. He thought now that the boldest of them would not dare to vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. Two alternatives were now presented to gentlemen. On one side, they had the opportunity of having the public printing executed for the lowest prices, and on the other side it was intended to reward a partisan press, by giving it a large donation out of the public purse. He wanted to bring the hard money gentlemen down to their own system. They have reduced my income, said Mr. T. and that of every man in the country, and it is therefore incumbent on them to bring the incomes of all their salaried officers down to the standard at which they have depreciated the money of the country. And if no other person did so, he himself would, before the close of the session, introduce a bill to reduce the salaries of the officers of Government, so that they may bear the same comparison with the value of money that they did when they were fixed.

Mr. GRAVES said he did hope they should be able to bring the House to a direct vote on the proposition before it, without its being cut off by points of order or motions to lay it on the table. He appealed to the States Right gentlemen of the South, and said to them, that, as they professed to be the advocates of economy, they had now an opportunity of practising what they professed, by voting for the resolution. They had the balance of power in their hands, and on them would rest the responsibility of defeating the measure. The gentlemen who stood in opposition to the Administration were disposed to bring this matter to a test, and to try, by a direct vote, whether economy should be practised in this branch of the public expenditures. Mr. G. said he had been informed by a gentleman from Massachusetts, that the printing for the Legislature of his State was done at one half the price that was paid for the printing of Congress, and that both the work and the paper was of a much better quality. He believed with his friend from North Carolina, that a saving of $100,000 a year could be effected by letting out the public printing on contract.

Mr. VANDORPOEL observed that it seemed that they were all economists again; but he wished he could be satisfied on one point. The gentlemen from South Carolina and Kentucky were too late in their professions of economy. Sir, said Mr. V. we had a squabble of this kind two years ago last September, when these various topics of economy were discussed, and he hoped that circumstances did not alter principles as well as cases. At that time the Printer was elected, and under an agreement understood at that time, the work was executed at another office. Two years have since elapsed, during which time legislation could have been had on this subject; but the gentlemen from Kentucky and South Carolina [Messrs. THOMPSON and GRAVES] were then as silent as the grave. Where then were all their protestations of economy? Why did they not then bring forward their resolution, or originate an act to remedy the evil now complained of? And he would ask if they were not chargeable with having encouraged extravagance, when they sat silent for two years, and permitted the public printing to be done in the old mode. He did not know all the reasons which influenced gentlemen to entertain these new found notions of economy, but he did know that, within the last five or six months, the sober second thought of the people had expressed very loudly the belief that this Administration carried out those professions of economy and retrenchment which brought them into office.

Mr. V. after enumerating the several States in which the elections had gone in favor of the Administration since the last Congress, remarked that the decisive echoes of this "sober second thought" had not, however, reverberated through the ears of the present sticklers for economy before the termination of the last Congress; and therefore, perhaps, circumstances did not require them to look so closely then to the emoluments of the public printer. Where were they, he asked, at the last session of Congress, and why did they not then rise and press this subject? Sir, (said Mr. V.) it is now proposed to postpone the resolution, and we had the same thing enacted in September, 1837; but he had looked at the debates and the votes given at that period, and he would now see whether they would adhere to their votes then. Gentlemen wanted to postpone the resolution, and send it to a committee. How were they going to get along with the public printing while the committee was seeking information to make up its report? How will you get the printing of the message, and other documents, while the committee was making up its report? No gentleman has made any suggestion to that effect. He believed that every gentleman had made up his mind how he would act on this same proposition, if made under different circumstances. Believing that it would be impracticable to carry the resolution into effect, so as to provide for pressing emergencies, he would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. PICKENS [Mr. VANDERPOEL, at his request, having withdrawn his motion] observed that, as he was somewhat interested in this question, he desired to make a few remarks in regard to it. At the extra session of 1837, he made a motion that the public printing should be given out on contract to the lowest bidder, and that the Clerk should superintend it. But from the difficulty of execution it was, in a few days, repealed, and another motion substituted for it. We had had occasion to examine the law of 1819, which fixed the prices to be given for the public printing, and, therefore, without a repeal of that law, the printing could not be let out on contract. He agreed entirely with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the price of the public printing should be reduced if it is found to be too high, and he would go for a law fixing the subject indefinitely. He hoped this Congress would not rise without passing a law to purchase a public press and employ a superintendent of the public printing; and he hoped, further, that this superintendent should not be connected with the public press. The great question now, however, was how the public printing should be executed. It was necessary now that they should adopt some means of having the public printing executed according to the law of 1819, and he would suggest to gentlemen whether they could repeal that law without the consent of the other House. As to his colleague's suggestions with regard to the reduction of prices, they could be reduced as well after the Printer was elected as before. This House was not bound to give the public Printer the prices fixed by the law of 1819. Let it reduce the prices if, on examination by a committee, they should be found too high, and he himself would go for that reduction, if convinced that it was necessary. But the question was, how were they to get along with the public printing, if the resolution of last Saturday should be postponed, and the subject referred to a committee? Mr P. said he only rose to explain his position on this question, and to say that he would, at any time, go for a reduction of the prices of the public printing. Mr. P. then renewed Mr. VANDERPOEL's motion to lay Mr. ANDERSON's resolution on the table.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then called for the yeas and nays on Mr. PICKENS's motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved that the first part of the report of the Select Committee raised during the last Congress upon the memorial of F. P. Blair, recommending a change in the manner of executing the public printing, be read by the Clerk, for the information of the House. Also, the resolutions of the said committee, appended to the said report.

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay that motion on the table; and the yeas and nays having been taken on this motion, it was decided in the negative—yeas 107, nays 116.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved to amend the motion so that all the report should be read.

Mr. GALBRAITH here submitted a point of order, as follows:

The point of order is, that a motion having been made to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky on the table, and the yeas and nays ordered on that motion, the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina for the reading of a certain document, the same having been objected to, is not in order.

The SPEAKER having decided against the point of order raised by Mr. GALBRAITH,

Mr. SMITH of Maine said the reason which induced him to offer his amendment, was this: The resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina did not go far enough. It only proposed the reading of the recommendation of the committee, that a change should be made in the mode of executing the public printing. Now he wanted the whole report read, in order that the House might have the reasons why the committee recommended this change. When this report should be read, gentlemen would find developments made in it that would not be very palatable to them.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS did not hear the decision of the CHAIR on the point or order raised by the gentlemen on his right [Mr. GALBRAITH.] He wanted to know if the CHAIR had decided that it was in order to propound a question to read papers, after a motion to lay the subject to which they related on the table.

The SPEAKER said that it was in order.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS asked if an appeal from that decision was in order.

The SPEAKER replied that it was too late now to make an appeal.

After some conversation, in which Messrs. SMITH of Maine, VANDERPOEL, HUBBARD and BANKS participated,

The report of the Select Committee was read.

Some further conversation took place in relation to the resolution recommended by the Select Committee, in which Messrs. BOND, PETRIKIN, McKAY, WISE, VANDERPOEL, and HILLEN participated; after which, the resolution was also read.

Mr. BYNUM said he rose to submit a resolution, which he would offer in case that of the gentleman from Kentucky should be laid on the table, and which would test the sincerity of gentlemen who made professions about economy.

The question was then taken on laying Mr. ANDERSON'S resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 111.

Mr. BYNUM then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will forthwith proceed to the election of a public Printer, who shall discharge the duties of a Printer until otherwise ordered.

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed to report to this House what means can be adopted to have the public printing executed in the best manner, and at the least possible cost; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The CHAIR decided the resolution to be out of order.

Mr. BYNUM then withdrew it.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to suspend the rules and order, with a view of permitting the gentleman from North Carolina to offer the resolution.

Mr. CRAIG hoped that this resolution would be received by general consent.

Mr. WISE would agree with his colleague, if gentlemen would extend this inquiry, not only to the reduction of the expense of printing, but to an entire divorce—yes, divorce was the word of the Government—from the political press. If the inquiry would extend this far, he would vote for it with all his heart.

Mr. PETRIKEN and several other gentlemen objected to the reception of the resolution.

The motion to suspend the rules was then decided in the negative—yeas 134, nays 87—it requiring two-thirds to suspend the rules.

Mr. CLARK attempted to present a resolution to authorize the present Printer of the House to do the printing until a Printer was elected; but the CHAIR ruled it out of order.

The CHAIR said he would now receive nominations for Printer to the House.

Mr. SMITH of Maine then nominated BLAIR & RIVES.

Mr SHERROD WILLIAMS then asked if it would be in order to move to reconsider the resolution in relation to the election of officers.

The CHAIR said it would not be, the order having been partly acted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will it be in order to lay it on the table?

The CHAIR replied that it would not, as a nomination for Printer had been received.

Mr. SBADE inquired if a motion to rescind or postpone would be in order.

The CHAIR said a motion to postpone would be in order.

Mr. SLADE then moved to postpone the execution of the order indefinitely.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, that the motion to postpone was in order.

After a discussion of some length on this point of order, between Messrs. BELL, PETRIKIN, JAMESON, SLADE, BRIGGS, LEWIS, HUBBARD, TILLINGHAST and HOLLEMAN, the last named gentleman moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CRABB then moved that the House adjourn; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 105, nays 106.

Mr. SLADE said, as the vote just announced showed that there was a disposition on the part of the House to proceed to the election of a Printer, he would withdraw his motion to postpone.

Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS said it had been generally understood, that if they had postponed the election of a Speaker until after the President's Message was received, the Opposition could have elected their Speaker; and as there might be a chance of defeating Blair and Rives, by delaying the election of a Printer until after the message was received, he now moved that the House adjourn, which motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 106, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Black, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, A. G. Brown, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Wm. B. The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Dec. 23, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: In your paper of Saturday last, I am reported as having voted in the negative upon a proposition, the effect of which was, to retain the viva voce mode of voting in the elections of the House.

My name is recorded in the affirmative, and I so voted.

Respectfully yours, &c.

JNO. HILL of N. C.

Messrs. BLAIR and RIVES.

[Mr. HOOK of Pennsylvania voted in favor of the viva voce, and his name was recorded on the journal as voting against it.—EDITOR GLOBE]

IN SENATE,
TUESDAY, Dec. 24, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by A. VAN BUREN, esq. his private secretary.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The annual message of the President to the two Houses of Congress was then read by the Secretary of the Senate. [See Appendix]

When the message was read, Mr. ALLEN rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Courtesy has, I am aware, made it the custom for a Senator representing the State from which the President comes, and agreeing with him in political sentiments, to move the printing of his annual message; yet the Senator from New York will, I believe, excuse the deep feeling which prompts me thus to rise, and in the exultation of renewed hope, excited by this paper, for the future security of our institutions and welfare of the people, submit that motion myself.

If, standing in this place, the friend of all, the enemy of none, I may be allowed to address a single request to the whole body of my countrymen, it is, that each man of them will deliberately consider this message, and that part of it, especially, which relates to corporations, banks, and the currency.

To guaranty forever the rights, the happiness of individual man—to protect the feeble against the rapacity of the strong—the whole against the combinations of the parts, by an equal distribution of burdens and of blessings among all—was the cardinal object of our civil institutions. But, notwithstanding this, these rights have been violated—this happiness perilled—this rapacity allowed—these combinations formed—and this equality destroyed. These things have been done, and that, too, under the authority of law. Corporations innumerable freckle the face of the land. Corporations which, not content with absolute power over the currency—over the property—over the labor of the entire people, now seek to render themselves immortal, and their dominion complete, by political associations. Hence has arisen the paper system, with all its complexity of fraud and oppression; hence the pending strife between man and monopoly; and hence it is that the world now beholds this nation struggling, like the fabled Laocoon, to disengage its own body, and the bodies of its sons, from the fatal coil of a serpent, whose convulsive energies have compressed those bodies well nigh unto death.

When, in 1837, after the universal crash of the banking system, the President recommended its severance from the Government, and the Government's restoration to its ancient policy, the people, unprepared alike for the ruin around them, or the remedy proposed, remained, for a moment, equally confounded by both. State after State reeled from its perpendicular and slid from his support; politician after politician fled for safety or for succor to the arms of his foes; yet he, almost alone, amidst the general consternation, amidst the desertions of the venal and the shrieks of the timid, stood unappalled—confiding, as he ever has, does, and ever will, in that "sober second thought" of his countrymen, which is "never wrong, and always efficient." And now, sir, sustained by the matured judgment of a grateful people—grateful to him, because he was faithful to them—faithful, even at a time when that very fidelity was at the hazard of their displeasure—the President presents again to his fellow-citizens a chart of principles, by which, if with skill we steer this our political ark, freighted as it is with our hopes and our destinies, it will bear us onward in safety and in peace, however violent the storm of exasperated passions.

Mr. A. concluded by moving that fifteen hundred copies of the message and documents, and five thousand additional copies of the message, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Governor of Iowa to the Secretary of State, in relation to the disputed boundary line between that Territory and the State of Missouri; which, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 2, 1839, in relation to the changes necessary in the present system of marine hospitals; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Acting Commissioner of Pensions, in conformity with a resolution of the Senate of May 29, 1830, showing the rejected applications for pensions for 1839; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of State, showing the number of American seamen registered in each port of entry of the United States, during the year 1839; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 19, 1838, containing a general statement in relation to the salt duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a report from the Secretary of State, accounting for the expenditure of the contingent fund; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, being his Annual Report on the state of the Finances; which was ordered to lie on the table, and fifteen hundred additional copies to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with an act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON said that, since the order had been given for the printing of the President's message, he had conversed with several of the Senators, and they all concurred in the propriety of having an additional number printed. He would, therefore, move that five thousand copies, in addition to those already ordered, be printed.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of the heirs and representatives of Anderson Lane; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. N. also presented the memorial of the Mayor, Alderman, and inhabitants of the city of New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Andrew C. Armstrong now on file, be referred to the Committee of Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. NICHOLAS,

Ordered, That the petition and papers in relation to the claim of George M. Passeau be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES presented a memorial from sundry inhabiants of Belfast, Maine, praying for a reduction of the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of a number of citizens of New York, praying the establishment of a port of entry at Milwaukie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of William Redin, praying that certain duties may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he entirely and heartily concurred in the sentiments expressed of the President's message, and the propriety of printing the extra number of copies; but there was another document which more imperatively required the printing of an additional number. This was the Secretary's Annual Report on the state of the Finances. The message will be printed in every newspaper of the country, and will thus have a universal circulation; but the size of the Secretary's report would prevent its publication in any but a few of the papers in our larger cities. The fifteen hundred copies ordered would give us only about twenty copies each, and he would himself have at least fifty applications for them. He would, therefore, move that three thousand five hundred additional copies be printed, making five thousand in all, which would enable each Senator to circulate seventy copies of this important and interesting document.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of William H. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and J. W. Simonton; which was read twice, and, with additional papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill for the relief of William A. Whitehead, late a collector of customs at the port of Key West; which was read twice, and, with additional papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a bill more effectually to secure the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, agreeably to notice given, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills:

1. A bill to provide for a standing and permanent pre emption system, with sales, also, to actual settlers at reduced prices.

2. A bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the two per cent. fund arising under her compact for admission into the Union.

3. A bill to cede to the State of Mississippi a quantity of public land equal to that heretofore granted to the State of Ohio for the purposes of internal improvement.

4. A bill to authorize the substitution of other lands in place of school sections which are useless or unproductive.

5. A bill in relation to certain railways and rivers in the State of Mississippi.

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALL, agreeably to notice given, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills:

1. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes."

2. A bill to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin.

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills:

1. A bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

2. A bill to relinquish to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her admission into the Union, to be applied to the making of a road, or roads, leading to said State.

3. A bill to establish an additional land district in the State of Alabama.

4. A bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June 22, 1838.

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRENTISS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the establishment of a Board of Commissioners to hear and determine claims against the United States; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Lemuel White; and

A bill for the relief of Margaret Barnes, widow of Elijah Barnes;

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRESTON, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of General Croghan and General Wool; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PIERCE moved the reference of the petition of David Green, on the files of the Senate, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. P. also gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett.

A bill for the relief of Samuel Collins.

A bill for the relief of John S. Billings.

A bill for the relief of Hannah Leighton.

Mr. P. also offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report, as soon as may be convenient, a bill for the equalization of the pay of the officers of the line and the staff of the army.

Mr. DAVIS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained notice to bring in a bill to remit such duties, and to cancel such bonds, as have been required of persons engaged in the whale fishery, to restrain all future exactions of duties of such vessels and their cargoes; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

A bill for the relief of Samuel White; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. H. also presented the memorial of Isaac Bronson; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the purchase of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal by the United States; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Col. Francis Vigo; which was read twice, and, with accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

A bill to authorize the New Albany and Mount Carmel Railroad Company to enter, on a credit, a quantity of land, to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albany to Mount Carmel, Illinois; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals

Mr. SMITH also offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to continue the construction of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the ensuing year; and that said committee also inquire in the expediency of appropriating a sum of money sufficient to complete said road to Jefferson city, Missouri, to be paid over to the several States, within whose limits the road is to be constructed, in annual instalments, as the same may be required to ensure an economical, energetic, and speedy completion of the work: Provided, The States will agree to accept the appropriation, and apply it to the object intended, and discharge the General Government from any further appropriations; And provided, also, That the States have authority to lay and collect toll on said road, sufficient to keep it in repair after its construction; and shall allow the arms and munitions of war of the General Government to pass on the same toll free.

Mr. SEVIER, in pursuance to notice given, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy; and

A bill for the relief of Richard T. Banks;

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned until Friday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
TUESDAY, December 24, 1839.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, his private secretary. [See Appendix.]

ceedings.]

After the reading of the message,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the message be laid on the table and 10,000 copies printed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL hoped the gentleman would not make the motion to print until a Printer was elected.

Mr. PETRIKIN then withdrew his motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina renewed the motion to lay on the table and print.

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to this motion being made until a Printer was elected.

Mr. WISE desired to have the message printed, and cared not by whom it was done.

Mr. VANDERPOEL had no doubt, if a motion was entertained to print the message, a discussion would spring up on it which would interfere with the election of Printer.

Mr. WISE then moved to lay the message on the table and print 5,000 copies, with accompanying documents, and 15,000 copies without documents.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for a division of the question, so as to take the question on the motion to lay on the table first.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend, "and that the message, without the documents, be printed within four days from this time."

Mr. WISE accepted this as a modification.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved to amend by adding, "and that the Message be printed under the direction of the Clerk."

Mr. STANLY moved to strike out 20,000 and insert 6,000. A great deal had been said by gentlemen about economy in the expenditures, and the President had specially recommended it in his message. Then let the gentlemen begin a system of economy at the threshold.

The motion to lay the message on the table was then agreed to.

Mr. TURNEY then moved to lay the motion to print on the table, with a view of proceeding to execute the order of the House; which motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, which was laid on the table. He also stated that he had upon his table various other reports and communications from the Departments.

Mr. PETRIKIN proposed a resolution for the appointment of the standing committees; but the SPEAKER decided that it was not then in order.

The CHAIR then announced the order of business to be the election of a Printer.

Mr. GIDDINGS then moved to suspend the order of business for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expressly understood that the election of Printer shall give to the persons elected no right to do the public printing for a longer time than the House shall hereafter deem compatible with the public interest.

The CHAIR said the motion to postpone would be in order, but the resolution of the gentleman would not be in order, because it was contrary to the act of 1819, which specified the duties of the Printer and the time he was to serve.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired if the election of Printer was to take place by ballot, under the law of 1819, or viva voce, under the rule adopted by the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it would be time enough to decide that question when it arose.

Mr. FILLMORE said they were now about to execute the order, and it was time it was known how it was to be executed.

The CHAIR said he had had some difficulty on this subject, but his opinion was that the mode prescribed by the law of 1819—namely, the election by ballot—was the mode to be pursued by the House.

Mr. McKAY said he would state, for the information of the CHAIR and the House, what had taken place in the Senate on this subject. The resolution of 1819 not only said that the Printer should be elected by ballot, but it went on to declare that the person having the greatest number of votes should be declared duly elected. This elected a Printer by a plurality of votes; yet, in 1827, a resolution was introduced in the Senate by one of the most distinguished lawyers in the country, [Mr. CLAYTON of Delaware,] and passed, declaring that no person should be elected, except by a majority of the votes of the members present. This, then, was an alteration of the resolution of 1819 by one body. Again: the resolution of 1819 provided that the election of Printer should take place near the close of a Congress, thus giving one Congress the power of electing officers for the next.

In his opinion, this resolution of 1819 was, in some respects, unconstitutional; for if the Printer was an officer of the Government, as some gentlemen contended, the Executive must have the appointment of that officer under the Constitution. But if the Printer was an officer of the two Houses," then each House had it in their power to elect or appoint them in such manner as they thought proper.

Mr. FILLMORE replied to the remarks of Mr. McKAY, and went into an examination of the various modes adopted for appointing public Printer, and went into an argument at some length to show that the Printer of Congress was not an officer of that body.

Mr. DAWSON next followed, and urged a postponement of the election of Printer for the present, for the purpose of a certaining what plan could be adopted of reducing the expenditure for that branch of the public service. He spoke of the high prices paid for the public printing, and said that the sums paid the last year were so enormous, that Mr. Allen, the Printer of the House, sold the work to Gales and Seaton, the former Printers of the House, and made a fortune by it. Mr. D. referred to the information he had received from a member from Massachusetts relative to the printing done for the Lesislature of that State, which he said was done forty-five per cent. cheaper, and much better work. He urged upon the House the propriety of abolishing the old plan of executing the public printing, and of substituting a more economical one.

Mr. VANDERPOEL, to whom Mr. DAWSON alluded in his speech, explained the language he used yesterday. Mr. V. yesterday asked why, and he now included the gentleman from Georgia too—why did they sit with arms folded for two years, after the last Printer was elected, and not propose some measure to reduce the price of the public printing.

Mr. DAWSON, on concluding his remarks, presented the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the order of this House, in relation to the election of a Printer, be postponed until the 1st day of February next.

Resolved, further, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to employ some suitable person or persons to execute the necessary printing of this House, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of 1819, until further ordered by this House.

Resolved, further, That a select committee be appointed to inquire whether the public printing of this House cannot be better and cheaper done by contract than by the existing mode.

The SPEAKER said his opinion was that the motion was not now in order, but if the gentleman would modify his motion, so as to make the postponement to a day certain, it would be in order.

Mr. DAWSON modified his resolution, so as to make the postponement until the first of February.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said the point he made yesterday, and from which the gentleman from Georgia could not escape, was, that this fit of patriotism, which had all at once seized upon certain members of this House, came rather late; and now, by way of eluding the force of that position, the gentleman from Georgia said that the Administration party, almost to a man, voted against Mr. PICKENS's proposition. But gentlemen knew that this and various other propositions, were made for the purpose of staving off the election of Printer, when it was approaching, and that the Administration party voted as they did now, against what they conceived to be mere obstacles thrown in the way, at the same stage of its proceedings. But by the aid of the Conservatives, the Opposition succeeded in electing their Printer, after which they were silent for two years, and made no propositions for a reduction of this branch of the public expenditure. He would ask gentlemen if their short lived notions of economy were not at a time when they supposed the Administration had a majority, which was the fact, as elected by the people; and when, by the aid of a little squad of Conservatives, they had elected an Opposition Printer, if their propositions for economy did not cease? They supposed the game was in their own hands, and acted accordingly. Why did they sit silent for two years, and not move in this matter? The Opposition had their printers (Gales and Seaton) in the name of Allen. The game was in their own hands, and therefore, they made no propositions for two years for economy in the public printing.

Mr. MASON of Ohio addressed the House, urging the necessity of carrying out the system of economical expenditure recommended in the message of the President just received, and he called upon the friends of the Administration to join with the Opposition in commencing this economy with the public printing. Mr. M. charged the party of the Administration with making hypocritical professions of attachment to retrenchment and reform, which they never reduced to practice, and congratulated the party with which he acted upon the prospect of soon having an Executive in power who would be sincere in his professions. He saw, in the recommendations of economy found in the President's message, evidence that his power was about to be taken from him, and it was therefore that he recurred to the principles which brought him into office. Mr. M. after speaking of the expenses incurred by the House for printing during Mr. Adams's administration, which, he said, were less than the expenses during Mr. Van Buren's, went on to refer to the necessary expenditures of the Government since the Democratic party came into power. He went into an argument to show that the most economical plan of executing the public printing would be to let it out on contract to the lowest bidder.

Mr. DAVIS contended that there was nothing in the resolution of 1819 which made it incumbent on the House to proceed to the election of a public Printer at this time. He thought the resolution of 1819, referred only to the election of a public Printer "for the ensuing Congress" following the session when that resolution was adopted; and that the election ought now to be postponed to take into consideration the expenditure that might be saved by graduating the prices in proportion to the cheapness of materials, the facilities afforded by improved machinery, and the reduced prices of labor. Replying to Mr. VANDERPOEL, he charged the Administration with extravagance and with making professions of economy which they were unwilling to practice.

Mr BOND replied at length to the remarks of Mr. VANDERPOEL, commenting on the proceedings of the House at the session of 1837, when the public Printer was elected.

Mr. BYNUM addressed the House at some length, in reply to the remarks of Messrs. DAWSON and BOND, showing that they had acted inconsistently in regard to this question. [A report of his remarks will be published as soon as they can be prepared by the reporter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, and this question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 86.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then rose to a point of order. He submitted to the CHAIR, whether the motion for the House to adjourn over until Friday was in order, while another subject was pending, and not decided on. It required a vote of two-thirds, he said, by the rules of the House, to put this question.

The CHAIR said it was too late to raise that question now.

Mr. GIDDINGS then moved that the House do now adjourn; and the yeas and nays being called for by Mr. BYNUM and several others, the question was taken in this way, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 79.

CORRECTION: Our reporter misunderstood the remarks of Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS on moving an adjournment last evening. Instead of saying, "it had been generally understood, that if they had postponed the election of a Speaker until after the President's message was received, the Opposition could have elected their Speaker," as reported in the Globe, Mr. WILLIAMS said it was generally understood at the commencement of the 25th Congress, that if the President's message had been sent in before the election of Speaker, the Opposition could have defeated Speaker Polk.

Mr. BENTON also, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries," approved July 29, 1813, and to repeal all acts in continuation or amendment of the same; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROANE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill giving the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate all the information which it is in the power of the Department to obtain as to the value of the different State bonds in the London market. Also, the value of the different railroad and canal stocks of the respective States in the home market.

Mr. B. also offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to obtain from the constituted authorities in Florida, a statement of all the Territorial bonds issued, and authorized to be issued, in that Territory, with copies from the journals of the Council, showing any thing that was done in authorizing the issue of such bonds, with the names of the members of the Council at that time, their votes in each case, the names of the Governors who may have approved laws for the issuing of Territorial bonds, or who may have signed or endorsed the said bonds; also, the purposes for which said bonds were issued, and when issued in favor of corporations, the names of the corporations, and the corporators and their officers, and the use made of said bonds, and the present value of said bonds in the American and European markets, with the condition of the corporations which have had the use of said bonds, and how far they are fulfilling the purposes for which they were created. Also, a statement of all the acts of incorporation which have been passed by the said Legislative Council of Florida, since the 3d of March, 1823, and the acts in amendment thereof, and when, and how said acts were reported to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress.

Mr. B. also offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper inquiries to be made of all disbursing officers and agents, and all contractors, (the Post Office Department inclusive,) to ascertain from them whether they have sold or exchanged Government drafts or other Government funds, or their own drafts on the Government, during the years 1838 and 1839, for paper money of the following descriptions:

1. Bank notes of the State banks of the United States, and especially notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

2. Bank notes of the present Bank of the United States, and especially notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

3. Post notes of the present Bank of the United States, and especially any of such notes of a less denomination than one hundred dollars; also, of a less denomination than twenty dollars, and which had been made payable at more than sixty days after date, or which were not due, or which had been altered by the pen; and if so, that they report the times and places of such sales or exchanges, and with whom made, and the amounts so sold or exchanged.

Also, that the President communicate to the Senate the name of any disbursing officer, agent, or contractor, who shall fail to answer the foregoing inquiries in a reasonable time. Also, that he communicate a list of such Treasury or Post Office drafts in favor of disbursing officers, agents, and contractors, for the years 1838 and 1839, as shall appear to have been sold, with the names of the endorsers, and to whom paid; that the Secretary of the Treasury cause inquiries to be made of the deposite banks, since the general resumption of specie payments in 1838, whether the Government drafts which have been sold by disbursing officers, agents, and contractors, have been usually paid in specie; and if so, all the particulars as to the several sums and total amounts paid, and to whom paid, and where, as nearly as can be stated.

Mr. BENTON also offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which can authorize the Legislative power of the Union to assume the debts of the States which have been contracted for local objects and State purposes.

2. That the assumption of such debts, either openly, by a direct promise to pay them, or disguisedly, by going security for their payment, or by creating surplus revenue, or applying the national funds to pay them, would be a gross and flagrant violation of the Constitution, wholly unwarranted by the letter or spirit of that instrument, and utterly repugnant to all the objects and purposes for which the Federal Union was formed.

3. That besides its flagrant unconstitutionality, such assumption would be unjust, unwise, impolitic and dangerous, compelling the non-indebted States to incur burdens for others which they have refused to incur for themselves—diverting the national funds from national objects to State objects—and thereby creating a necessity for loans or taxes, or issues of Federal paper money, to supply the place of the funds so diverted—prostrating the barriers of economy, moderation, and safety, in the creation of State debts, by separating the function of contractor from that of payer of the debt—extinguishing the sense of responsibility in the contractor, and making the Federal Government the ultimate payer of all the obligations contracted by the States for their own purposes—establishing a dangerous precedent, which must soon be followed up by new debts on the part of the States, and new assumptions on the part of the Federal Government—invading the rights and mortgaging the property of posterity, and loading unborn generations with debts not their own—creating a new national debt of large amount at the start, and of a nature to perpetuate its own existence—begetting a spirit in Congress, which must constantly cater for distributions, by preventing necessary appropriations, and keeping up unnecessary taxes—laying the foundation for a new and excessive tariff of duties on foreign imports, to fall unequally on different parts of the Union, and most heavily on the planting, grain growing, and provision raising States, to their manifest injury, and probable great discontent—involving disastrous consequences, either to the Union itself, or to its members, as tending to the consolidation of the States, and their ultimate abject dependence on the Federal head as the fountain of their supplies or tending to the annihilation of the Federal head itself, by stripping it of all its means of natural defence and self support, and reducing it to the helpless imbecility of the old Confederation—giving a new impulse to the delusive career of the paper system, already in a state of dangerous overaction—insuring the establishment of another National Bank—and, finally, begetting a passion for periodical distributions of lands and money, and extensions of Federal credit, which could find no limit to its demands until the national domain was exhausted, the Federal Treasury emptied, and the credit of the Union reduced to contempt.

4 That the debts of the States, being now chiefly held by foreigners, and constituting a stock in foreign markets, now greatly depreciated, any legislative attempt to obtain the assumption or securityship of the United States for their payment, or to provide for their payment out of the national funds, must have the effect of enhancing the value of that stock to the amount of a great many millions of dollars, to the enormous and undue advantage of foreign capitalists, and of jobbers and gamblers in stocks; thereby holding out inducements to foreigners to interfere in our affairs, and to bring all the influences of a moneyed power to operate upon public opinion, upon our elections, and upon State and Federal legislation, to produce a consummation so tempting to their cupidity, and so profitable to their interest.

5. That foreign interference and foreign influence, in all ages, has been the bane and curse of free Governments, and that such interference and influence is far more dangerous in the insidious intervention of the moneyed power, than in the forcible invasions of fleets and armies.

6. That to close the door at once against all applications for such assumption, and to arrest at their source the vast tide of evils which would flow from it, it is necessary that the constituted authorities, without delay, shall RESOLVE and DECLARE their utter opposition to the proposal contained in the late London Bankers' Circular in relation to State debts, contracted for local and State purposes, and recommending to the Congress of the United States to assume, or guaranty, or provide for, the ultimate payment of said debts.

The resolution, on motion of Mr. B. was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN offered the following resolution, which lays over:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed, who, together with a like number to be appointed by the House of Representatives, shall direct the expenditures of all moneys appropriated to purchase books for the Library of Congress.

Mr. FULTON offered the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing ports of entry on the western border of the State of Arkansas, to be located on Red river and Arkansas river; and also of entitling all foreign merchandise exported over land from those ports into Mexico, to drawback.

Mr. HUBBARD offered the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the acts of Congress granting pensions for disabilities incurred during the last war, so as to have the pensions of such invalids commence at the time this disability was received.

Mr. YOUNG offered the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of of establishing a port of entry and delivery at the city of Cairo, in the State of Illinois.

The following resolution, submitted some time since, by Mr. TAPPAN, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate:

1. What would be the effect upon the military service of the country, of a regulation by which all officers of the army, on arriving at sixty years of age, should be permitted to retire from service upon half pay.

2. What would be the probable annual charge upon the Treasury of such a regulation.

The following resolution, submitted some time since by Mr. DAVIS, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform the Senate—

1. Whether duties have been exacted of any vessels of the United States employed in the whale fishery, for tonnage, or the produce of such fisheries, and if so, under what authority.

2. What papers were furnished to such vessels before they cleared, and were they such as have at all times been granted to vessels thus employed.

3. What amount of duties and charges have been paid, what amount bonded, and are the bonds now in force, and unpaid.

4. Are duties now exacted of all such vessels as they arrive, and what amount of fees, if any, have accrued to officers of the customs from this source, and at what places.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, so much of the President's message as relates to our foreign relations was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, so much of the President's message as relates to the fiscal affairs of the country was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, so much of the the President's message as relates to military affairs was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. WALL, so much of the President's message as relates to the judiciary was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, so much of the President's message as relates to the militia and the report of the Secretary of War was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL, so much of the President's message as relates to commerce was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. ROBINSON, so much of the President's message as relates to the post offices and post roads was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, so much of the President's message as relates to naval affairs was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. FULTON, so much of the President's message as relates to the public lands was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, December 27, 1839.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Hon. CHARLES FENTON MERCER, stating that he had resigned his seat in the House; which was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following message from the President of the United State; which was laid on the table:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith communicate to Congress copies of a letter from the Governor of Iowa to the Secretary of State, and of the documents transmitted with it, on the subject of a dispute respecting the boundary line of Missouri. The disagreement as to the extent of their respective jurisdictions has produced a state of such great excitement, that I think it necessary to invite your early attention to the report of the commissioner appointed to run the line in question under the act of the 18th June, which was sent to both Houses of Congress by the Secretary of State on the 30th of January last.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23, 1839.

The resolution from the Senate providing for the election of two Chaplains of different denominations for the two Houses, was taken up and concurred in.

Mr. HOFFMAN then submitted a resolution to continue the rules and orders of the House in force until the 10th of January; which was considered and adopted.

Mr. WISE submitted a resolution that the standing committees of the House be now appointed by the SPEAKER. Mr. W. explained that he used the word now, in the resolution, but it was understood that the committees would not be announced until Monday. He wished further to say, through the SPEAKER, to his constituents, and he spoke to them especially, that he did not desire, during this session of Congress, to be placed on any of the standing committees of the House; and he requested that the SPEAKER might not place him on any of those committees. He hoped the SPEAKER and the House would indulge him in this request for private reasons, which it was not necessary for him to divulge to the House. Mr. W's resolution was then considered and adopted.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet again on Monday; which motion was considered and adopted.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

The CHAIR announced the next business in order to be to dispose of the resolution with regard to the election of Printer.

The question pending was on three resolutions submitted by Mr. DAWSON: the first to postpone the election of Printer to the 1st of February; the second to authorize the Clerk to employ a printer in the mean time; and the third to appoint a committee to inquire whether the printing could not be done in a better and cheaper manner than at present,

Mr. GIDDINGS was entitled to the floor upon this question.

Mr. THOMAS said as there appeared to be a number of members absent at the present time, there had been some interchange of opinions on this subject, and there appeared to be a general disposition to adjourn this subject over until the second of January, when there would probably be a full attendance of members.

Mr. DAWSON gave notice to the House that he would, when the subject comes up for consideration, offer a resolution as a substitute for the last resolution, which, in substance, proposes to separate the public printing from political journals.

After some little conversation between Messrs. DAWSON, STANLY, BRIGGS, THOMAS, and GIDDINGS,

Mr. DAWSON modified his first two resolutions, as follows; and, thus modified, they were adopted by the House:

Resolved, That the order of the House in relation to the election of a Printer, be postponed until the 10th day of January next.

Resolved, further, That the Clerk of this House be authorized, in the mean time, to supply some suitable person or persons to execute the necessary printing of this House, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of 1819, until said 10th day of January next.

The third resolution, which was in the following words, was then postponed until the 10th of January:

Resolved, further, That a select committee be appointed, to inquire whether the public printing of this House cannot be better and cheaper done by contract than by the existing mode.

Mr. CRABB then, at the request of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER,] moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the Senate relative to the appointment of Chaplains, was concurred in.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia said he should not have troubled the House on this subject if it had not been for the hasty manner in which this question had been gotten up and disposed of. He had long determined that, on a proper occasion, he would present his views to the House on this subject which had just carried, and hence it was that he had asked a friend to move a reconsideration, and he would now briefly state a few points of objection, to which he would ask the serious consideration of the House. He believed the prospective interests of the country demanded that this subject should be thrown beyond the reach of this House. He believed the House had proceeded in this matter without just and proper authority. He believed that all the objects held in contemplation by the resolution for the appointment of a chaplain, from time to time, had failed in practice. He believed the effect of the employment to be evil; he believed that this was not the season to enter upon such a duty, and that this was not the place for it. What was the proposition which had been adopted? It was for the appointment of a chaplain for this House. Who is he? Is he an officer of this House? By what authority do you appoint him? If there was an authority, he wished to be pointed to it. By looking to the history of our legislation, he found that in 1789, and again in 1816, a resolution had been passed fixing the compensation of officers Here is the only authority. Now he contended that the objects of this appointment had entirely failed. What is the object? To spread abroad through the members of this House a wholesome moral influence. He appealed to gentlemen whether it did have this effect The object was doubtless to spread this beneficial influence over this great country. But, according to his observation, the reflection of the religious and moral part of the community where he resided were against the wholesome, moral effect of this appointment. Then, as he had said before, the object of this appointment failed. What are the effects of it? They seemed to be evil. The moral and political effects of this appointment, he contended, must be continually evil. The resolution, to be sure, proposed to elect two chaplains of different denominations, but notwithstanding this, he objected to it, because this matter of religious denominations should not be agitated in this House. It might be true that no difficulty would arise now in relation to this matter, but a time might come when there would be a difficulty. Ten years ago there would have been no difficulty in settling the question which has been distracting us here for nearly a month. Now was the time, therefore, for taking some action on this subject, if we wish to avoid all difficulty hereafter. This matter of sectarianism might create no difficulty for some time, but a time might come when it would. It was not two hundred years since a king of England was required to make a formal declaration of religious tolerance; it was not one hundred years since a man in this land of liberty dare not think religiously as he pleased; and it was scarce fifty years ago since, by the adoption of our Constitution, it was found necessary to declare that no religious tests should be required.

All history tells us that this matter was one which never failed to force itself on every Government, and to connect itself with the organic Government for the purpose of carrying out its objects. But he said this was not the season for such duties. In the morning or at evening, if he were asked whether we should attend to our closet or private devotions, he would say it was becoming and appropriate. In this hall, at the hour of twelve, habitually, we meet to do the daily work of the country, as servants of the people. Would the husbandman, after attending to his daily morning devotions, assemble his laborers again in the field to do and repeat the like service? If this was a convention for some great and special occasion, such services would be appropriate. This, he said, is not the place. Is the man of your choice, said he, a devout man, full of the spirit of the gospel? He will lead us to the temples of the Most High, where in solemn voice he will declare to us the being of a God, and the truths of his religion—where he can hear chanted the songs of Zion. Does he come to show us the "river of water of life, clear as crystal?" He will take us to the tabernacle of the congregations, there to spread the heavenly chart, in which is shown the course of that blessed stream. Does he appear to point us to the "lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world?" He will invite us to the house of God, in which is spread the table of the Lord, bearing the reminiscences of his love.

But does he come to make merchandise of his calling? Here, then, (if he was not misinformed,) is the place where men in high places meet to drive bargains. Here, too, he may have his contract signed, sealed, and delivered, whereby, for and on consideration of a certain number of prayers, suitably short, a given number of sermons, not too long, ringing excepted, by him, the said chaplain, uttered and delivered, we, the members of this House, do agree to be and appear in our seats on such occasions, devoutly and in order to listen, and after a certain time to pay him $500.

In the execution of this contract, it is remarkable, that, by usage, this House is not expected to perform only that part of their engagement, which requires the payment of the money, being at liberty to set, or stand, or walk in, or remain out, and even employ themselves in writing letters during morning service.

It is, sir, said Mr. COOPER, to avert this deleterious example, and prevent the insinuation of religious denominations, by sects, into this House, that I urge a reconsideration, that we may not exercise powers not granted, and may prevent a union of Church and State.

Mr. R. GARLAND was glad this motion had been made, as it would give him an opportunity to record his vote against the resolution for the appointment of a chaplain. He was disposed to respect ministers of the Gospel when they conducted themselves properly, as any other gentleman, although he did not profess or practise religion himself; yet he had seen enough in this hall to prevent him from ever supporting a resolution for the appointment of a chaplain for this House. He had seen the claims of ministers urged upon this House upon the ground of the political predilections, and one had been elected upon the sole ground that he was a friend of the President of the United States. Men coming before the House on such pretensions, threw disgrace upon the country and upon the gospel, and he hoped the House would no longer sanction it. There was a regular system of electioneering for the office of chaplain, and the general inquiry was, does he make short prayers—the person making the shortest prayers being the greatest favorite. Besides while the chaplain was making his morning prayers, a large portion of the members were reading newspapers, or walking about the Hall. In fact, the service was nothing more than a solemn farce, and he trusted the House would dispense with the chaplain.

Mr. WISE said this was the first time since he had been in public life that the propriety of appointing a man of God, to remind us of our daily duty to God, had been questioned. Sir, (said Mr. W.) I can with truth say that I am among the vilest of sinners in this body; I can with truth say that I have more personal reasons, if personal reasons were to govern me, for opposing the election of a chaplain, than any other gentleman on this floor; but, sir, there is no consideration that would make me, a representative of the people on this floor, a member of a House of Commons in a representative Republic, divorce a Republic from the God of nations. Let me tell those who are now desirous of divorcing the State from the Church, that they cannot divorce a nation from the God of heaven. He has more power than you have to dispense with nations as with individuals; and who will pretend to say that no good may be done by making our acknowledgments here, as it were, with the uplifted hands of a nation, that there is a good Providence which presides over the destinies of the nation. If there be any one thing more opposed to the existence of a Republic, it is infidelity. Infidelity was the handmaid of anarchy in France, and he trusted that we would not encourage it by departing from the example of our forefathers. Gentlemen had spoken of the unconstitutionality of this appointment, but he would not examine into the constitutionality of a question of this kind. The situation of chaplain might have been, and he believed it had been, filled with hypocrites, but there had been illustrious examples to the reverse. He referred, as an example, to that pious and holy gentleman of the Protestant Methodist persuasion, Mr. Stockton, and he was also referred, by a gentleman near, to the Rev. Mr. Reese. These men had been elected without electioneering, and he believed they had done much good. He himself had felt the benefits of this service. He had come into the hall at the hour of meeting, his bosom rankling with party passions; but after hearing the supplications of the man of God, he became composed and tranquil. He would, therefore, vote for the appointment of a chaplain now and forever.

Mr. NISBET opposed the motion to reconsider. He thought it would be a stain upon the journals if the members of this House, the Representatives of the greatest nation upon earth, should, at this period of our history, rescind the resolution for the appointment of an individual to perform religious service in this hall. He considered the arguments against the appointment of a chaplain more specious than sound; and assured gentlemen that the people of this country not only looked up to us to set a good example in this respect, but required of us to do this much, for the sake of Christianity. His colleague and the gentleman from Louisiana, had urged upon us a divorce of Church and State, but he thought if gentlemen would go to New England, and ask of the descendants of the pilgrim fathers what civil liberty in this country owed to the church, they would receive for answer that it owed every thing to it. The pilgrims fled from another country, because they were persecuted on account of their religious opinions, and in this country they brought religion to aid in the establishment of our liberties.

That grave and venerable body which framed our present form of Government, had the benefit of the prayers of the ministers of that day, and Congress had adopted the practice of electing persons to perform religious service, and he hoped we would not now take upon ourselves to dispense with the services of the clergy. If there had been improper conduct on the part of some of the clergy, he considered that to be an insufficient argument to warrant us in dispensing with their services entirely. He believed that the religious feeling of the people of this country expected this much of us, and he would never consent to dispense with the services of the minister of God in this hall.

Mr. SLADE said his constituents felt a very deep interest in this subject, and he trusted the House would not dispense with the services of a chaplain. He desired most heartily to thank the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in his own name, and in the name of his constituents, for the speech which he had made on this occasion. It was the more gratifying to him, because, from what he knew of the gentleman, he knew that that speech had been forced from him by the convictions which his religious education had implanted in his bosom, and which he felt assured pervaded the great mass of the gentleman's constituents. We receive our first impressions on religious subjects, to a considerable extent, from ministers of the gospel, and why should there be the slightest objection raised to having one perform services in this hall; and he held that there was not the slightest danger to be apprehended of a union of Church and State from this course.

Mr. CRABB said he could not have anticipated, when he made his motion, that it would give rise to so much discussion; but had he foreseen its effects, it would have been an additional motive with him for submitting his motion. The resolution had passed as a mere form; and there was no expression of opinion with regard to it by any of the members present. If there was a majority in the House opposed to the resolution, he wished them to have an opportunity of recording their names against it; if, on the contrary, there was a majority in its favor, he wished that majority to be clearly shown. His motion, therefore, had had the effect of calling the attention of the House to the subject, as well as of bringing out the opinions of the members in regard to it. He was one of those opposed to the appointments of chaplains for that body. He thought that they had no right to appropriate the public money to any object; and that if they had religious services performed in that House, it ought to be performed by men who did not claim a reward for it. He would venture to assert that there were men in this city who would be willing to act as chaplains for the House without money and without price; and, by accepting the services of such persons, they would have clergymen officiating there from a pure spirit of Christianity, and not for the sake of the salary, and who would seek the employment without being influenced by party.

Mr. C. said that, as the subject had been sufficiently discussed, he would withdraw his motion, unless some other gentleman wished to address the House on it.

Mr. COOPER requested the gentleman from Alabama to suspend the withdrawal of his motion for a moment. He had but one word more to say in explanation of his views, as he perceived that many gentlemen, on different sides of the House, did not appreciate the motives by which he was governed. It was very far from him to attempt, by any act of his, either in his individual capacity, or as a Representative from the State of Georgia, to divorce this House from the God of Nature, or the God of Revelation. That same God whom you and I adore—that God whom I would have presented in all his living attributes, and whom I would have implored for the preservation of our liberties and the durability of our institutions—that God whom our forefathers worshipped, is He, the object of our reverence. But my colleague would have it that I would drive the ministers of the Gospel from this hall, and strike a blow a our holy religion; at that religion which I would have announced on this floor, and in this House, on all suitable occasions. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that there are difficulties in our way which I trust in God I may overrate, but which we ought not to overlook. I do not propose to divorce this House from the spirit of religion, nor yet from its forms; but my object is, that forms may not be set up instead of the substance. It was the neglect of te substance of religion, and an abuse of its forms, which caused that infidelity, of which gentlemen had spoken, to spread over all France in the time of the Revolution; and it will become gentlemen to remember this lesson, and to beware lest they injure the cause of religion by adhering to its forms only. In addition to the allusion of his friend from Georgia, Mr. COOPER said he would ask gentlemen to put their hands on the authority by which they would take the money of their constituents and pay it over to a chaplain, when many, here represented, believed that it was not right to pay a man for dispensing the word of God. Tell me (said Mr. C.) where is your is your authority for appproppriating the money of the people in this way; and when you do, (said Mr. C.) I will take my seat until the people of this country shall think better of it, and take the power away. Believing as he did that such power would be dangerous, he would be the first man to persuade the people to take it away, and thus sever all connection between Church and State. The very fact that gentlemen, in favor of the resolution, had alluded to, that the first Congress of the United States employed chaplains, taken in connection with the fact that they inserted a provision in the Constitution, by which no money can be taken from the Treasury, without authority of law, spoke volumes against this resolution.

Mr. CRAIG observed that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOPER] had taken the ground that they had no authority, under the Constitution, to take the people's money and pay it to a chaplain. I admit, said Mr. C. that we have no express authority in the Constitution to pay a chaplain, as such; but if the gentlemen will tell me by what authority we can take the people's money, and pay it to our Clerk, Sergeant-at-arms, and Doorkeepers, I will show him as good authority for paying a chaplain. The Constitution gives to this House the power to appoint its Speaker and other officers. Now, in the authority here given, the Speaker is the only officer named, leaving to the House to say what other officers are necessary; and therefore the House can as well create the office of chaplain, as that of Clerk or Sergeant-at-Arms. If gentlemen would look back to the proceedings of the old Congress, they would find that the chaplain was then considered an officer of the body. So, also, our forefathers appointed chaplains as officers in their army and navy; thus showing that in their legislative, as well as military proceedings, they did nothing without asking a blessing from Him alone who can dispense blessings worth asking for. Mr. C. replied to the arguments of Mr. GARLAND, that, during Divine service in the morning, members were inattentive, engaged in reading newspapers and in writing letters, and that but few of them attended to the service. But (said he) do not gentlemen see that these arguments would go to close the doors of every church? If there was disorderly conduct, want of attention, and a disinclination for religious exercises on the part of members, their pious chaplain would tell them that this was the strongest reason why he should continue his exhortations. Mr. C. in conclusion, said he knew not whether any clergyman had ever sought and obtained the chaplaincy of the House from interested motives; but he could safely say that such was not the case with Mr. Reese, the late chaplain. After highly eulogizing Mr. Reese as a pious and sound divine, Mr. C. said that, so far from his having been contaminated by the office conferred on him, they found him at the close of the session the same mild, humble, and zealous Christian that he was at the commencement.

Mr. RICE GARLAND said that it was very easy, upon a question like this, to preach a sermon to rouse the feelings of the country; but he would remark, that upon the question of the usefulness of religion, or the divinity of the Christian religion, he would not yield to the gentleman from Georgia, or the gentleman from Virginia, [Messrs. COOPER and WISE.] This last question, however, did not enter into their consideration at all. If it did, much might be said of that religion, which attempted to establish an office thus provided for in the resolution. The condition of revolutionary France, and the infidelity that overspread it, had been alluded to, but he would ask if there was not good reason to believe that that infidelity took its rise from the abuses under the forms of religion that prevailed long prior to that period. He, however, was not opposing religion, or even its forms, in opposing the adoption of the resolution. He did not object to commencing their daily proceedings with religious exercises, but he did object to a man coming there, seeking the office of chaplain on political grounds, and pleading to the religious sympathies of the country to sustain him. We have had (said Mr. G.) good men standing in that desk, and no doubt some bad ones; but he doubted if their services had ever resulted in producing any good effect. If we are a light, set on a hill, as the gentleman from Vermont says, to set an example to the country, we set a very bad example. Gentlemen stand here under the pretence of hearing prayers, and read newspapers, or take their seats and write letters while prayer is going on; and indeed it is seldom that more than thirty or forty members are observed in their seats. Was that the kind of example that is to be set, and that is to go forth to the country? In deciding upon the proposition before them, it was not for them to say, whether the Christian religion was useful or not, but whether the office of chaplain was necessary; and if he could show that hypocrisy had been made use of to put money in the pockets of political partisans, under the pretence of religion, he would show good cause for dispensing with the office. Mr. G. concluded by expressing the hope that the gentleman from Alabama would not withdraw his motion, but would give him an opportunity of recording his vote against the resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS here called for the previous question; and the House having seconded the call, the main question on reconsidering the vote adopting the joint resolution of the Senate, was put and decided in the negative—yeas 12, nays 168.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that fifteen thousand copies of the President's Message, and five thousand copies of the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. STANLY then moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was lost—ayes 63, noes 79.

Mr. C. JOHNSON then renewed his motion.

The SPEAKER suggested that there was a resolution to print the message and documents that had been laid on the table on Tuesday, and that a motion would be necessary to take up that resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then moved to take it up, and called for the previous question; when

Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS moved an adjournment; but the yeas and nays being called for on the motion,

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew it.

The question on seconding the previous question was then put and carried, Messrs. CRABB and BYNUM tellers—ayes 101, noes not counted.

The question was then taken "Shall the main question be now put?" and carried—yeas 109, nays 73.

The main question was then taken on printing 20,000 copies of the message and 5,000 of the accompanying documents, and carried—yeas 120, nays 54.

Mr. JAMESON here rose and submitted a resolution.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, who voted with the majority, moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken on printing the message of the President, and accompanied the motion with some remarks.

Mr. JAMESON rose to point of order. He had risen before the gentleman from South Carolina, and was announced by the CHAIR as being entitled to the floor. He had also sent his resolution to the Clerk's table; but before it could be read, he was interrupted by the gentleman from South Carolina. He contended, therefore, that his motion had precedence over that of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. THOMPSON called the gentleman from Missouri to order.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from Missouri was first entitled to the floor, and had submitted his resolution, and that no gentleman had a right to interrupt him in it; but the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina being a privileged motion, it had precedence over that of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. JAMESON referred to a decision given the other day by the SPEAKER, in the case of a privileged motion made by a gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CHAPMAN,] with which the decision just made conflicted. He asked that he might have the benefit of the decision given the other day.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON then moved an adjournment; and Messrs. MONTGOMERY and JAMES GARLAND being appointed tellers, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—ayes 91, noes not counted; so

The House adjourned until Monday next.

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TAPPAN, agreeably to notice, introduced the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, to wit:

The judges of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices for the term of seven years, if so long they shall behave themselves well. And the commissions of all judges of said courts who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment shall expire as follows: those who shall have been in office twenty years shall expire in one year; those who have been in office ten years shall expire in three years; and the commissions of all who have not been in office ten years shall expire in seven years.

The resolution was read twice, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committe on Commerce, to which was referred the bill to remit such duties, and to cancel such bonds, as have been required of persons engaged in the whale fishery, to restrain all future exactions of duties of such vessels and their cargoes, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred a joint resolution authorizing the President to cause certain surveys to be made, reported the same without amendment, and recommended its passage.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred a bill for the relief of William H. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and J. W. Simonton; and

A bill for the relief of William A. Whitehead, late collector of the customs at the port of Key West;

Reported the same without amendment, and recommended their passage.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate a statement, showing, in a condensed form, the amount drawn from the Treasury in each year of the five years immediately preceding the commencement of the present session of Congress, in consequence of special legislation by Congress upon private claims.

The following resolution, submitted same days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of the records, and of all the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, and also of the Court Martial lately held at St. Louis, on Lieutenant Colonel Brant; also, the copy of his resignation; and, also, of all the papers connected therewith.

The following resolution, submitted some days since, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate as follows:

1. The articles of foreign import, which, being manufactured into a different article in the United States, are allowed a drawback of duty on being exported; with the quantities and values of such imports and exports, and the amounts of duties received, and drawback paid on the same, from the year 1833, inclusive, to the end of the fiscal year of 1839.

2. The amount of drawback which would have been payable on such exportations, if the act of March 3, 1839, for the reduction of duties, commonly called the Compromise act, had provided for a reduction of drawback in proportion to the periodical reduction of duty.

3. The probable quantities and values of such imports and exports, and the amounts of duties receivable, and of drawbacks payable thereon, from the year 1840, inclusive of that year, to the consummation of the Compromise act, in 1842, and for one year thereafter; provided the said act remains as it is.

4. The same quantities, values, and duties for the same time, with the annual amounts of drawback, which would be payable if the drawback underwent reductions proportionately with the reductions of duty.

5. A table of recapitulation and comparison, showing the annual difference, and the aggregate difference between the amounts of drawback paid and payable under said act, from 1833 inclusive to 1842, and one year thereafter, if the act remains as it is, and the amounts that would have been paid and should become payable hereafter, if the drawbacks had been subject to reduction in proportion to the reduction of duties from the date of the act.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, so far as it may be in the power of the Treasury Department to obtain the information, the names of all the banks in the United States which may have stopped specie payments during the suspension of 1839; also of those which did not stop; noting those which may have recommenced payments; the whole divided into classes by States and Territories, and the District of Columbia.

Also, that he cause to be communicated to the Senate the names of all banks, if any, which have refused to pay the Government demands, Post Office inclusive, in specie, when demanded; with all the circumstances of such failure, and the correspondence to which it led.

Also, to inform the Senate whether any of the Departments have information, or have reason to believe, that any of the Government creditors have been paid in depreciated currency, since the general resumption of 1838.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENTON some days since, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate all the information which may be in his power or possession relative to the imposition of tolls and the annual amounts collected, on all sorts of vessels, empty, light, or heavily laden, on the Louisville and Portland canal, from the opening of the same to the present time; and the general expenses attending the Canal. Also, the annual amount of dividends belonging to the United States. Also, the number of shares held in said canal stock by the United States, and the amount paid upon them. Also, the number of vessels of all kinds which have passed the said canal annually since it was opened. Also, whether the said canal is completely finished and put into a condition to pass vessels through in the shortest time practicable.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to address proper queries to the surveyor of the port at Louisville, and also at St. Louis, to be answered by themselves, and also to be communicated to the steamboat captains generally, in relation to the effect of the tolls on the said canal, and the amount thereof on their respective vessels for each time they pass through, and the aggregate amount for the season, or a year; and the comparative amount of the tolls paid to the canal, and the profits cleared by the boat; with an estimate of the amount of tolls which a regular trader of a given tonnage, between St. Louis and Louisville, and between New Orleans and Louisville, would pay in the number of years that such steamer would last, supposing her to continue in the same trade as long as fit for service; also, a comparative estimate of such aggregate tolls, with the original cost of the vessel; and a further comparative estimate of such tolls, with the other expenses incident to the running of the steamboat.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana proposed the following amendment:

"And also the capacity of said canal at this time to admit, without delay, the commerce of the river that must necessarily pass through the same; and whether one canal at that point, of any given capacity, containing the necessary locks to overcome the falls, would be sufficient to pass without delay the commerce ascending and descending the river, for future years; and also whether, in order to afford full and entire facilities in overcoming the falls of the Ohio, so as to pass the commerce of the river, a canal on the Indiana side of the falls, of sufficient capacity to pass boats of the largest class, in addition to the canal on the Kentucky side, is not, or will not in a few years become, indispensably necessary, taking into consideration the probable increase of the commerce; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the result of his inquiries, at the earliest day practicable."

Which being accepted by Mr. BENTON, after some remarks from Messrs. CRITTENDEN, SMITH, and BENTON, the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate as follows:

1. A table of the import and export of gold bullion, with the excess of each, annually, from the commencement of the Federal Government, or as far back as the returns in the Treasury Department will enable the table to be made up.
2. A like table of gold coin.
3. A like table of silver bullion.
4. A like table of silver coin.
5. A table of recapitulation, showing the total annual imports and exports of coin and bullion in one column, and the excesses in two other columns, for the same length of time.
6. A detailed statement of the weekly exportations of coin and bullion for the year 1839, showing the names and residences of the exporters, and their consignees in foreign countries
7. A detailed table of exports and imports of coin and bullion of the United States for the year 1839.
8. A table of the annual coinage of gold and silver at the Mint of the United States and the Branch Mints, from the time they were respectively established.
9. A table of the annual product of the gold mines of the United States from the time of their discovery.

The whole of said tables made up to the end of the year 1839.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate all the information which the War Office contains, or can conveniently procure, of the massacres of individuals, of families, of small parties, and of shipwrecked crews or passengers, which have taken place in Florida during the present hostilities, and including those which took place before the war became open on the part of the Indians; noting, so far as it can be conveniently done, how far families have been broken up, and driven from their homes, their houses burat, and their fields and property destroyed.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to send to the Senate all the information in his possession relating to the southern boundary line of the Territory of Iowa.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as has been received at the Treasury Department from consuls and secretaries of legation respecting the fiscal regulations in force in foreign countries, and not contained in his communication to the Senate of the date of January 21, 1839.

The following resolution submitted some days since by Mr. LINN, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate any information in the Department of State, or any other Department, relative to the disputed boundary between the State of Missouri and the Territory of Iowa, and which has not been heretofore communicated to the House of Representatives; and also to communicate copies of any proclamations of the Governor of Missouri and the Governor of the Territory of Iowa in relation to said disputed boundary, and the orders, if any, for calling out, or holding the militia in readiness to act in relation to the same; and also any further information on the subject which it may be in the power of the Departments to give.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. LINN, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Senate that the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon is indisputable, and never will be abandoned.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to give notice to the British Government that the conventions of 1818, and 1827, which give the right to use and occupy the Oregon Territory, its bays, rivers, harbors, &c to both parties indiscriminately, shall cease in twelve months after such notification.

Resolved, That it is both expedient and proper to extend such portions of the laws of the United States over the Territory of Oregon, as may be necessary to secure the lives, liberty, and property of our citizens who may reside in said Territory.

Resolved, That it is expedient to raise an additional regiment of infantry, (rifles,) for the purpose of overawing and keeping in check various Indian tribes, or any foreign forces, who may be in said Territory, or on its borders; and at the same time to give ample protection to our citizens engaged in legitimate occupations.

Resolved, That six hundred and forty acres of land should be granted to every white male inhabitant of said Territory of the age of eighteen years, who shall cultivate and use the same five consecutive years, and to his heirs at law in the event of his death.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the resolutions were referred to a select committee of five, and ordered to be printed.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. WILLIAMS, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the number of copies of the laws of Congress printed for the several States and Territories under the act of 20th April, 1818.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. LUMPKIN, was considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail stage route from Clarksville, Habersham county, Ga. to Asheville, N. C. via the town of Clayton, in Rabun county, Ga. and the town of Franklin, in Macon county, N. C. And also a weekly mail route, to be carried on horseback, from the town of Lafayette, in Walker county, to the town of Salem, Dade county, in the State of Georgia.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to Abel Pennington, of Captain A. Byram's company of North Alabama volunteers, serving in Florida, for a horse, shot by order of the commanding officer in January, 1838.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. PIERCE, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report, as soon as may be convenient, a bill for the equalization of the pay of the officers of the line and the staff of the army.

Mr. P. said he was in expectation of shortly receiving some information from the Department in relation to this subject, and asked that it be passed over for the present; which was agreed to.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, was taken up for consideration and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to continue the construction of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the ensuing year; and that said committee also inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money sufficient to complete said road to Jefferson city, Missouri, to be paid over to the several States, within whose limits the road is to be constructed, in annual instalments, as the same may be required to insure an economical, energetic, and speedy completion of the work: Provided, The States will agree to accept the appropriation, and apply it to the object intended, and discharge the General Government from any further appropriations: And provided, also, That the States have authority to lay and collect toll on said road, sufficient to keep it in repair after its construction; and shall allow the arms and munitions of war of the General Government to pass on the same toll free.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. BENTON on Friday last, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper inquiries to be made of all disbursing officers and agents, and all contractors, (the Post Office Department inclusive,) to ascertain from them whether they have sold or exchanged Government drafts or other Government funds, or their own drafts on the Government funds, during the years 1838 and 1839, for paper money of the following descriptions:

1. Bank notes of the late Bank of the United States, and especially notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

2. Bank notes of the present Bank of the United States, and especially notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars.

3. Post notes of the present Bank of the United States, and especially any of such notes of a less denomination than one hundred dollars; also, of a less denomination than twenty dollars, and which had been made payable at more than sixty days after date, or which were not due, or which had been altered by the pen; and if so, that they report the times and places of such sales or exchanges, and with whom made, and the amounts so sold or exchanged.

Also, that the President communicate to the Senate the name of any disbursing officer, agent, or contractor, who shall fail to answer the foregoing inquiries in a reasonable time. Also, that he communicate a list of such Treasury or Post Office drafts in favor of disbursing officers, agents, and contractors, for the years 1838 and 1839, as shall appear to have been sold, with the names of the endorsers, and to whom paid; that the Secretary of the Treasury cause inquiries to be made of the deposite banks, since the general resumption of specie payments in 1838, whether the Government drafts which have been sold by disbursing officers, agents, and contractors, have been usually paid in specie; and if so, all the particulars as to the several sums and total amounts paid, and to whom paid, and where, as nearly as can be stated.

On submitting the above resolution, Mr. BENTON said that it implied so much, and such grave censure, that he felt himself bound to show that he was not proceeding gratuitously, and without information, but that he was in possession of facts which justified the movement. He said that he had received information of every kind which the resolutions supposed to exist, and even that immense sums had been drawn in specie from the deposite banks by the Bank of the United States, since she stopped payment. He mentioned one instance of this kind, in which the Bank of Missouri paid ninety thousand dollars in specie to a Bank of the United States agent for a Treasury draft, which issued the day before the Bank of the United States stopped payment, and was sold to her agent for her notes, which notes were disbursed on account of the United States, while the specie drawn from the Missouri Bank was shipped to Philadelphia, and probably thence to Europe. Mr. B. then read the following letter, as a specimen of the information he possessed:

Memorandum of matters relating to the circulation of United States Bank notes, which came under my own observation, while acting as disbursing agent of the Government in the Cherokee country.

Sometime in the spring of the year 1838, two gentlemen arrived at the Cherokee Agency, (one of whose names, I think, was Roberts, the other's not remembered,) to whom I was introduced. They were said to be agents of the United States Bank, whose business appeared to be to exchange the notes of that Bank for Treasury drafts, or drafts from the paymasters and disbursing agents on the Government. They did make exchanges to a considerable extent, but to what amount I cannot say. They had, I understood, in their possession, a large amount of the notes of the Bank, and that they, after leaving the agency, went to Little Rock, Arkansas, on business of a similar character. One of the contractors (now in Washington) for furnishing subsistence to the emigrant Indians west, yesterday told me that an agent of the United States Bank had been at Little Rock, and that he, together with his partners, negotiated a loan with him for $150,000, payable in six months, which, he added, would soon be due.*

In the summer of the same year, I was called upon by Maj. Chs. J. Nourse, of this city, to know if I had any Treasury drafts that I wished cashed, stating that he had old notes of the Bank of the United States that he would give me in exchange. I replied, that I had some drafts on New York and other places, which, if he would give me notes of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, I would enter into the arrangement, but that otherwise I would not, as I conceived the issue of these notes wrong, and contrary to law, and would not make myself an accessory to the wrong by circulating them. He observed that the other agents had made no objection to receiving them, and strongly urged my taking them likewise. Finding that I was not to be persuaded, we finally made an exchange, he giving me the notes of the Pennsylvania Bank. The old notes were generally of small denominations—tens, twenties; the new notes were mostly of like sums, with some fifties and hundreds. The twenties and hundreds of the new issue appeared to have been struck off for post notes, made payable to order, with the word "order" erased, and "John Ross or bearer" inserted. To all appearances, Mr. Nourse had a large amount with him; I think he said, of both kinds, something like a half a million of dollars. He also said he thought he should go to Arkansas, to endeavor to make exchanges there.

Washington, Aug. 20, 1839.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to obtain from the constituted authorities in Florida, a statement of all the Territorial bonds issued, and authorized to be issed, in that Territory, with copies from the journals of the Council, showing any thing that was done in authorizing the issue of esuh bonds, with the names of the members of the Council at that time, their votes in each case, the names of the Governors who may have approved laws for the issuing of Territorial bonds, or who may have signed or endorsed the said bonds; also, the purposes for which said bonds were issued, and when issued in favor of corporations, the names of the corporations, and the corporators and their officers, and the use made of said bonds, and the present value of said bonds in the American and European markets, with the condition of the corporations which have had the use of said bonds, and how far they are fulfilling the purposes for which they were created. Also, a statement of all the acts of incorporation which have been passed by the said Legislative Council of Florida, since the 3d of March, 1823, and the acts in amendment thereof, and when and how said acts were reported to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate all the information which it is in the power of the Department to obtain as to the value of the different State bonds in the London market. Also, the value of the different railroad and canal stocks of the respectives States in the home market.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. TAPPAN, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed, who, together with a like number to be appointed by the House of Representatives, shall direct the expenditures of all moneys appropriated to purchase books for the Library of Congress.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; and afterwards

Adjourned.

* These contractors were Glasgow and Harris, of Missouri.

Mr. KEMPSHALL, a member from the State of New York, appeared, qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. WISE then rose, and said that, with a view of preventing the strife which had heretofore agitated this House and the country, he now took the earliest opportunity to move a suspension of the rules of the House for the purpose of submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid upon the table, without further debate or further action thereon.

Mr. WISE said if there was any objection to this motion he would call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. FILLMORE said if it was necessary to make objection, he objected.

Mr. WISE then called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BELL inquired if the resolution could be amended if the rules were suspended?

The CHAIR was of opinion that it could.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House, but the House refused to order the call.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative—yeas 109, nays 77, not being two-thirds, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Bell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. [Mr. BLACK of Georgia not being within the bar at the moment that his name was called, asked leave to record his vote; but it was objected to.]

Mr. BELL inquired whether it would be in order to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, with this amendment, that all these petitions be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, without debate. It seemed to him that this would be the most proper disposition to make of them.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman's amendment would be wholly inconsistent with my resolution.

Mr. BELL. Then I will introduce a new resolution to this effect.

Mr. WISE said he would object to this. He would vote against this House taking any action whatever upon these petitions. As a Southern man, he would not admit that the House had any right to act upon these matters.

Mr. BELL should be very sorry to do any thing to interrupt the harmony of this body, and would not present the resolution, if the general sense of the House was against it; but if it would be acceptable to the members of the House generally, he would prepare such a resolution.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if he understood the gentleman from Tennessee as moving to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering the resolution alluded to, that all Abolition petitions should be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, without debate. He would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, that there was but one class of these petitions which could properly go to that committee, and those were petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. He had no sort of objection to those petitions taking that course. But there were petitions for the abolition of slavery in the Territories; for the abolition of the slave trade between the States, and against the admission of new States, whose constitutions tolerated slavery; and certainly these petitions should not be sent to the Committee for the District of Columbia. He had no sort of objection to having petitions in relation to slavery in the District sent to the Committee for the District, and he had no sort of doubt that that committee would make a report perfectly satisfactory at least to the Southern portion of the country.

Mr. PICKENS rose to inquire if this question was debatable.

Mr. ADAMS did not desire to debate the question at present, and was only making a suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee, that petitions relating to slavery should go to different committees. For his own part he would be perfectly willing that the committees on this subject should be appointed by the SPEAKER, according to his own views on this subject; only that these petitions should be received by the House, treated with respect, and referred to appropriate committees, and those committees might be as strong on one side as any gentleman here might desire them to be.

Mr. BELL said it had always been his opinion that the best mode of disposing of these petitions would be to refer them to a committee, and hence it was that he had proposed to introduce a resolution of the kind before alluded to; but as objection had been raised to that resolution, he would now wait until the question was brought up by the presentation of petitions on this subject.

Mr. WISE inquired if it would be in order for him to move a suspension of the rules again, for the purpose of introducing his resolution.

The CHAIR replied that it would not be in order, the House having just refused to suspend.

Mr. WISE. Then I will give notice that, on the presentation of all Abolition petitions, I will object to their reception, and move to lay the question of reception on the table; and I will say to Northern gentlemen and Southern gentlemen, that I do not admit the power of this House to legislate upon that subject.

Mr. RICE GARLAND then moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of submitting the following resolutions; and on that question he called for the yeas and nays:

1. Resolved, That the freedom of speech, of the press, and of the people, peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, are rights secured to every citizen by the Constitution of the United States; but in the exercise of these rights and privileges, no citizen or body of people in one State of this Union, has the right so to use them, or any of them, as to deprive the citizens or people in another State of their rights and privileges, or of the property secured to them by the Constitution and laws.

2. Resolved, That the power given by the Constitution to Congress, to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, gives no right or authority to take the probate property of any citizen in such district for public use, without just compensation, and much less does it confer the power to take such property for no use at all, without the consent of the immediately interested, and without making any compensation for it.

3. Resolved, That the interference, by the citizens of any of the States, with the view to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, is endangering the rights and security of the people of the District; and that any act or measure of Congress designed to abolish slavery in this District would be a violation of the faith implied in the cessions made by the States of Virginia and Maryland of said territory, a just cause of alarm to the people of the slaveholding States, and have a direct and inevitable tendency to distract and endanger this Union.

4. Resolved, That the House will not consider any proposition, petition, remonstrance, memorial, resolution, motion, or paper, asking or requiring, or in any manner relating to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the Territories; nor will this House consider any proposition, petition, remonstrance, memorial, resolution, motion, or paper, asking or requiring, or in any manner relating to, the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, or among the several States of this Union.

Mr. ADAMS wished to know of the gentleman from Louisiana, before voting upon this motion to suspend, whether it was understood that these resolutions which he had submitted were to be debated, or whether the previous question was to be called upon them as soon as they were presented.

Mr. R. GARLAND said that these were no caucus resolutions, and but two gentlemen besides himself had read them, previous to their being presented this morning, and it would be for the House to dispose of them in such manner as may meet its pleasure.

Mr. ADAMS could not trust the House against the previous question, and would therefore vote against a suspension of the rules; although he would be happy to have these resolutions presented to the House, and fairly and fully debated. That, said he, is what the country wants.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. GATES would inquire whether this motion to suspend the rules was in order. When the gentleman from Virginia asked to suspend the rules, it was not in order, because the House had refused to suspend the rules, and this was precisely the same proposition, except that there was prefixed to it certain abstractions of no consequence.

The CHAIR considered the proposition somewhat different, and therefore decided the motion to suspend to be in order.

Mr. WISE asked if it would be in order for him to move to suspend the rules on to-morrow morning, for the purpose of offering his resolution.

The CHAIR would decide that question when it would arise. He expressed the opinion, however, that such a motion would be in order.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that the gentleman from Virginia would not offer his resolution again to-morrow, as he should be satisfied with what had occurred to-day upon that subject. The gentleman cannot suppose that we will submit to another encroachment upon the rights of the people of this Union. We have heretofore had enough of that in the House refusing to act upon these petitions in any manner.

The CHAIR said the question was not debatable.

Mr. ADAMS said if the gentleman from Virginia was not permitted to debate it, he would not debate it; but as the gentleman from Virginia had been debating it, he took the liberty to do the same.

Mr. ALFORD wished to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana if it was his intention, by this resolution, that Abolition petitions should be received by the House. If that was the gentleman's intention, he must vote against it.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules, and decided in the negative—yeas 107, nays 82, as follows, there not being two-thirds in favor of a suspension:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Colquitt, Crabb, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kelm, Kemble, King, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Pope, Ramsey, Rayner, Reynolds, Ridgway, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Edward D. White, John White, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Barnard, Biddle, Black, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Coles, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Doan, Duncan, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Habersham, Hall, Hand, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, Jackson, James, Charles Johnston, Nathaniel Jones, Kempshall, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Mason, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Pickens, Prentiss, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Edward Rogers, Russell, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Storrs, Swearingen, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Weller, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—82.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked if the motion of the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] made on Friday last, to reconsider the vote on ordering the message to be printed, had been entered on the journal.

Mr. W. THOMPSON presumed that it had, and he was now entitled to the floor upon that motion. If it had not, he would now make the motion.

Mr. JAMESON then rose and made a point of order, in these words:

"He rose from his seat, [on Friday last,] addressed the SPEAKER, was announced by the SPEAKER as being entitled to the floor; and while in the possession of the same, sent a resolution to the Clerk's table. Before the resolution was read, and the question arising from it was stated from the CHAIR, and while he (the said JAMESON) was still in possession of the floor, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] rose from his seat and made a motion to reconsider the vote given in relation to the printing of the President's message.

"The points of order arising on the statement above are these:

"1. The SPEAKER should not entertain a motion to reconsider, before another motion, that had been previously made in writing, and sent to the Clerk's table, had been read, and stated by the SPEAKER, (rule 37;) for it might itself be a motion to reconsider, for any thing the SPEAKER might know, before it was read.

"2. The motion to reconsider cannot take such precedence over other motions as to require a gentleman, who is in possession of the floor, to yield it—for that cannot be done even upon a motion to adjourn, which is considered always in order, except when a member has the floor."

The CHAIR said he had announced the gentleman from Missouri, on Friday last, as entitled to the floor; and the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to reconsider, was not entered on the journal. But as the gentleman from South Carolina had risen this morning, and made the motion, it was the first business now in order.

Mr. JAMESON contended, that as he was entitled to the floor on his resolution, the gentleman from South Carolina could not make the motion to reconsider.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from South Carolina was entitled to the floor then. The gentleman from Missouri, he said, would be entitled to the floor, when resolutions were in order.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina addressed the House at considerable length, going into a review of the various topics touched upon in the Message of the President of the United States. He considered that that document was written with unquestioned ability and dexterity, if he might use such a term without disrespect to the President; but he contended that the President was not true to many of the doctrines put forth in the message. With regard to the State Rights doctrines of the message, they were his doctrines in every particular, but when he read them, he was reminded of the admirable doctrines contained in the message of President Jackson in 1836, and of his bad faith in issuing that odious document to the South, the proclamation, but nine days afterwards He feared Mr. Van Buren would be as unfaithful to these doctrines as Gen. Jackson was. He commented with some severity upon the part of the message in relation to the Florida war, and upon the proposition of the Secretary of War to bring that contest to a close. He pronounced the course of the Administration in relation to that war imbecile, and calculated to bring disgrace upon the military service of the United States, and declared that he would never vote appropriations for carrying on that struggle, unless the Government pursued a course better calculated to bring it to a termination than it had been. He next went into an examination of that part of the message in relation to the finances of the country, contending that the Government had been most extravagant in its expenditures, and declaring that Congress would be compelled to borrow ten millions of dollars in addition to the usual revenues of the year to carry on the operations of the Government for the coming year. With regard to the Sub-Treasury system, he contended that it could not be carried into operation, without operating most oppressively upon the people of the country. The effect of it would be, and the object of the President doubtless was, to establish a metallic currency, and to destroy the banks of the country; and this would produce such a depression in the prices of property, &c. as would never be submitted to by the people of this country.

Mr. THOMPSON having concluded,

Mr. DUNCAN moved the previous question on the motion made by that gentleman. Some of the documents, Mr. D. said, which the gentleman animadverted on, would answer him.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said, that as his sole object was to promote discussion on the subject of the message, and as that object had been defeated by the call for the previous question, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented various amendments to the rules; which were read, referred to the Select Committee on the rules, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SERGEANT submitted a resolution in relation to excess of postage paid by members of Congress; which was adopted.

The resolution laid on the table on Friday, for the printing of 10,000 copies of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Finances, was taken up and adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave, and introduced a bill to provide for the disposal and management of the fund bequeathed by James Smithson, deceased, to the United States, for the establishment of an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men. Read twice, and referred to a select committee to consist of nine members.

Mr. DUNCAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby advised and directed to swear into office Messrs. PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, DANIEL B. RYALL, WILLIAM R. COOPER, and JOSEPH KILLE, members elect from the State of New Jersey, and said members thereon be directed to take their seats until the contest is regularly determined by the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH suggested that the resolution was not in order, it requiring a vote of two-thirds to allow of its reception.

Mr. DUNCAN contended that it was a privileged motion that he had submitted, and therefore it could be offered at any time.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution at that time. He would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that many members were absent who wished to vote on this question, and that he had better not press its consideration at present.

Mr. DUNCAN observed that this was a question of privilege, and had never before been acted on. It related to the rights of the State of New Jersey, and her Representatives here. He would say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that he had no wish to push the consideration of the resolution at this time; but he wished to address the House on that subject, and as several members had expressed a wish for an adjournment, he would move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. PICKENS suggested that there were several public documents on the Speaker's table requiring the action of the House, and he hoped the gentleman from Ohio would withdraw his motion until they could be disposed of.

Mr. DUNCAN withdrew his motion, saying that he did not, in so doing, yield his right to the floor.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the paper submitted by the member from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was before the House.

The SPEAKER replied that it was not; and that it required a suspension of the rules before that paper could be received.

Mr. DUNCAN appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, on the ground that his resolution was a privileged motion, relating to the rights of the Representatives of one of the States of the Union; but, on taking the question, the House sustained the decision of the SPEAKER without a division.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following messages from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying documents, in regard to some difficulties which have occurred concerning the kind of papers deemed necessary to be provided by law for the use and protection of American vessels engaged in the whale fisheries, and would respectfully invite the consideration of Congress to some new legislation on a subject of so much interest and difficulty.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 17, 1839.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, on the subject of the law providing for taking the sixth census of the United States, to which I invite your early attention.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 17, 1839.

The SPEAKER communicated the following documents, viz:

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, exhibiting certain transfers of appropriations of the War Department. Also,

A report from the same, exhibiting certain transfers of appropriations made in that Department; both of which were referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in pursuance of the act of 2d March, 1799, an abstract of the returns made by collectors, showing the number of registered American seamen. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the accounts of Charles J. Ingersoll, which was referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate in relation to the execution of the 13th and 14th sections of the act to regulate the deposites of the public money, approved June 23, 1836; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of F. R. Hassler, as superintendent of the survey of the coast and of the construction of standards of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and 500 additional copies ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of State in relation to the expenditure of the contingent fund of that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

A report from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the expenditure of the contingent fund of that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

A letter from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, reporting the manner which all appropriations for the public buildings and grounds have been applied; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

A communication from the Department of State, transmitting, in compliance with the second section of the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government, a statement showing the expenditures of that Department for the past year: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of sundry citizens of Wisconsin in relation to the lead mines of that Territory: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the British colonial trade: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the Chickasaw fund: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A report of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the result of an examination and survey of Block Island: referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, being a supplement to the statements transmitted 4th January, 1836, exhibiting the sums paid yearly under each material head of expenditure from 1834 to 1839: referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures, and ordered to be printed.

A report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of duties on railroad iron: referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the names of the applicants for relief, under the act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount received yearly for five years past, by each collector of the customs, on account of fines and forfeitures: referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of War, with a report from the Commissioner of Pensions, in obedience to the resolution of 29th May, 1839, in relation to pensioners who have made application for increase of pension: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of War, showing the expenditures of the contingent fund of the War Department for the past year: referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

Two reports from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the expenditures of the Navy Department for the past year: referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to certain transfers of appropriations of the Navy Department: referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

Two reports from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements from the Second and Fourth Auditors, showing the balances standing on their books: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the commerce and navigation of the United States for the year 1839: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Two reports from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, showing the progress made in the public works, and the expenditures for the same during the last year: referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings, and ordered to be printed.

The Annual Report of the Clerk of the House: referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed; after which,

The SPEAKER communicated certain documents in relation to the New Jersey elections.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to refer them to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. TURNEY moved to amend the motion, by referring to the same committee the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, and all the papers in relation to the New Jersey elections in possession of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina inquired what was the nature of the document communicated by the SPEAKER, and how it came in possession of the House.

The SPEAKER said the document was composed of certain depositions taken in New Jersey, in relation to the late elections there for members of this House, and which had been transmitted to him by mail, and that the House was not in possession of any other documents on the subject.

Mr. HUBBARD was opposed to any reference whatever. There was, he said, no case of contested elections to go to the committee. All the questions that had been agitated in the House, had been in reference to the returns only. The only question that had been before them was, who were returned as members from New Jersey. When the question of contest was raised, then it would be time to refer the matter to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. BELL entirely concurred with the gentleman from Alabama. There was no petition contesting the seats of sitting members, for the House had decided that five of the New Jersey members should not take their seats. This question should be brought fairly before the House, and if no other member did, he would bring it forward as a privileged motion. He understood that there were four or five gentlemen claiming seats as Representatives from New Jersey, who had been waiting here since the commencement of the session, and their claims had not as yet been decided on. He hoped the House would proceed with caution in this matter, and recollect that they were about setting a precedent that would be followed in time to come, and not loosely refer these matters to a committee before any petition or question of contested rights was before them. If the House would receive a resolution that would relieve it from the difficulty in which it was involved, he was prepared now to make it. He thought that the motion submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] was the only one made in order this morning, for it was a privileged motion, inasmuch as it related to the question as to who shall occupy the vacant seats of the representation from New Jersey.

Mr. WISE contended that the reference proposed was exactly the way in which the question could be brought fairly before the House. The committee would, after examining the returns, and the testimony in possession of the House, make up their report, showing who have the legal credentials, and who ought to take their seats as the sitting members, while they are engaged in collecting testimony to enable the House to decide who are ultimately entitled to membership. This seemed to him to be the regular mode of proceeding, and he hoped the House would adopt it.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired of the CHAIR whether the returns of the polls at South Amboy and Millville, which were suppressed, were to be considered as included in the motion of reference, and would be sent with the other documents to the Committee of Elections?

The CHAIR supposed that the papers referred to by the gentleman from Ohio would not be included in the reference, and that no other papers would be referred than the depositions just laid before the House.

Mr. DUNCAN observed that he had so supposed; and as to those depositions, if they were lopsided, as he suspected, he should object to their reception.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that the depositions had been taken in accordance with the laws of New Jersey, and transmitted to the SPEAKER as directed by law.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired how these depositions came before the House.

The SPEAKER said that he had received them by mail, directed to him as Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRIGGS then observed that they were not properly before the House at this time. The rule was, when the Speaker received papers by mail, to retain them until calling over the States for the presentation of petitions, and then such paper was presented when the name of the State it came from was called.

Mr. BELL apprehended that the only question in order, and that could be in order, was, who were returned as members from New Jersey. The House ought to decide this question in some form or other; but he hoped the gentleman from Ohio, after what had been said by the gentleman from Virginia, as to the absence of members, would not press this question for the present.

Mr. ADAMS was in favor of a reference of all the papers relating to the subject, and of giving the committee power to send for persons and papers; and the committee, he said, should be instructed to inquire and report to the House who are members from the State of New Jersey; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DUNCAN said he rose to inquire whether certain papers were or were not in possession of the House, and whether they would be referred to the committee. He had been informed by the Speaker that there were no other papers in possession of the House, or that would be referred, except these one-sided depositions taken to support the claims of the certificate members. He should, therefore, oppose the motion. Mr. D. here yielded the floor to

Mr. TURNEY, on whose motion

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 31, 1839.

Mr. HUBBARD presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to the following effect:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, all connection between banking corporations and the Government of the United States, should be dissolved.

And be it further Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, no medium, or currency, should be received in payment of the revenues of the General Government, except gold and silver.

And be it further Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, the Independent Treasury is the only system for receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public revenues, recognised by the Constitution of the United States.

And be it further Resolved, That the Senators from this State in the Congress of the United States be instructed, and the Representatives requested, to use all proper exertions to effect the adoption of the Independent Treasury.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of the Chevalier De Gerstner, praying Congress to grant him the copyright, for five years, of certain statistical works; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of Hannah Gouge, a widow of a Revolutionary soldier, who had resided in New York 104 years, asking for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of James Thompson, agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, requesting permission to enter Bibles at the city of New York free of duty, for transmission to the Candas, while the navigation of the St. Lawrence is obstructed by ice; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PIERCE presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress, to the following effect:

Whereas certain propositions have been before the Congress of the United States, having for their object the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and whereas such a measure, in the opinion of this Legislature, is not only unconstitutional, but is calculated to diminish the public revenue and increase indirect taxation, by affording a pretext for the continuance of a high tariff—therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court convened, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives from this State be requested, to oppose every attempt which shall be made to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, or to make any other disposition thereof except for the constitutional purpose of providing for the common welfare and general defence of the United States.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. ROANE presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, requesting Congress to make an additional grant of land to satisfy outstanding military land warrants; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Pierre Menard, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the petition of the Trustees of the Presbyterian Church, at Connecticut Farms, for relief; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of D. A. Saltmarsh and Co.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Nathan Ranney, collector of the port of St. Louis; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. said, while he was up, he would make some suggestions respecting the number of documents ordered to be printed for the Senate. They had adopted the present number when the Senate was much smaller than at present; and by the increase in the number of Senators, the number of documents received by each for distribution, was greatly reduced. He thought that 2,500 would bear about the same proportion to the number of Senators at present, as 1,500 did when it was adopted.

Several Senators requesting Mr. B. to make a motion to that effect, he moved that 1000 additional copies of the President's message and accompanying documents be printed for the use of the Senate; which was unanimously agreed to.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, the petition and papers on file in relation to the case of John Grigsby, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SOUTHARD, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill regulating the pay of masters of the navy; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate, in accordance with a resolution adopted some days since, proceeded to the election of a chaplain for the present session.

The following was the result of the ballotings:

	First Ballot.	Second Ballot.
Mr. Cookman,	14	20
Mr. Bates,	6	9
Mr. McIvor,	7	6
Mr. Stewart,	5	0
Mr. Braxton,	3	1
Mr. Wilmer,	1	1

Mr. COOKMAN having a majority on the second ballot, was declared to be duly elected.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the estimated amounts which will be receivable from the salt duty during the years 1840, 1841, 1842, and 1843; also, the estimated amounts which will be payable on account of fishing bounties, and allowances to fishing vessels, during the same years; the said estimates to be all made on the basis of a non-alteration in the present laws regulating the said duties, bounties and allowances.

Also, that the Secretary be directed to communicate to the Senate any information in the Treasury Department going to show that fishing bounties, and allowances to fishing vessels, have been unduly or illegally drawn since the passage of the act in 1813 for renewing the duty on salt, and reviving the fishing bounties and allowances consequent thereon.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation sufficient to effect, by peaceable and pecuniary means and inducements, the immediate removal west of the Mississippi of all the Indians now in the Territory of Florida.

Mr. WALL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of certain obstructions in the navigation of the river Passaic and of Newark bay, in the State o New Jersey.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to improve the harbor of the city of St. Louis, Missouri.

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, after some remarks from Mr. WALL, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill establishing a Board of Commissioners to hear and determine claims against the United States, was taken up; and, after some remarks from Mr. TAPPAN and Mr. HUBBARD, on motion of the latter its further consideration was postponed until Monday, the 13th January.

The CHAIR announced the following as the committee, on the part of the Senate, to direct the expenditures of all moneys appropriated to purchase books for the Library of Congress, to wit: Messrs. TAPPAN, PRESTON, and WALL.

On motion by Mr. KING,

The Senate went into an Executive session, and afterwards

Adjourned until Friday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, Dec. 31, 1839.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the journal by striking from it the resolution submitted on yesterday by Mr. DUNCAN, viz:

Resolved, that the Speaker is hereby advised and directed to swear into office Messrs. PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, DANIEL B. RYALL, WILLIAM R. COOPER, and JOSEPH KILLE, members elect from the State of New Jersey, and said members thereon be directed to take their seats until the contest is regularly determined by the House.

Mr. DUNCAN said he had introduced this resolution not only because he considered it due to the individuals named in it, but because he believed it to be a privileged question.

The CHAIR said the gentleman could not proceed to discuss the merits of the resolution on a motion to amend the journal.

Mr. DUNCAN believed the resolution to be a privileged question, and he was sustained in this belief by a precedent on yesterday morning.

The CHAIR again intimated that the gentleman could not discuss the merits of the resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS contended that the resoluton ought not to appear on the journal, because the CHAIR had decided it on yesterday to be out of order, and the House had sustained that decision.

Mr. SMITH of Maine thought this resolution ought to go on the journal. It would be recollected, that, on a former occasion, a gentleman from New Jersey moved to have a certain protest entered on the journal, and, although the House decided by a solemn vote that it should not go on the journal, gentlemen had contended that it should go on; and they attained their object by moving it afterwards in the shape of a resolution, and calling the yeas and nays upon it, although the House again decided it should not go on the journal.

After a few remarks by Messrs. CUSHING, TILLINGHAST, and BROWN of Tennessee,

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays upon the motion; when it appeared there were—yeas 72, nays 83. So the House refused to amend the journal.

Mr. JAMESON then moved to amend the journal of last Friday, so as to make it conform to the state of facts as they occurred in regard to a motion made by him on that day. [The substance of the amendment will be found in Mr. J.'s point of order in yesterday's proceedings.

The CHAIR thought it was too late now to amend the journal of last Friday.

Mr. JAMESON contended that the journal might be corrected at any time; and read an extract from the Manual in support of this position.

The CHAIR then entertained the motion.

Mr. DUNCAN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—yeas 79, nays 77. So the question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. COLES moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or papers, touching or relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the abolition of slavery in the States of this Union, or either of them, or in the District of Columbia, or in the Territories of the United States, or either of them, or the removal of slaves from one State to another, shall, on the presentation thereof, without any further action thereon, be laid upon the table without being debated, printed or referred.

Mr. STANLY inquired if this resolution did not contemplate the reception of Abolition petitions.

Mr COLES said that depended upon the construction of the effect of laying petitions on the table.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired if the resolution could not be amended by the House, if the rules were suspended.

The CHAIR said it could.

Mr. CRABB said he should vote against the motion to suspend the rules, because—

The CHAIR. The question is not debatable.

Mr. CRABB continued. He should vote against suspension, because the resolution contemplated the reception by the House of these petitions.

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 87, nays 84, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, S. H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, W. O. Butler, Bynum, Carter, Clifford, Coles, Crockett, Cross, J. W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Fornance, Galbraith, J. Garland, R. Garland, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Kemble, King, Leet, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Newhard, Parris, Pickens, Pope, Ramsey, J. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, D. D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, E. D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and C. H. Williams—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Barnard, Biddle, Black, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Carr, Casey, Chinn, Clark, Colquitt, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, E. Davies, Doan, Duncan, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Green, Habersham, Hall, Hand, William S. Hastings, J. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, Jackson, James, Chas. Johnston, Nathaniel Jones, Kempshall, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Lowell, Mallory, Marvin, Morgan, C. Morris, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Parish, Parmenter, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Storrs, Stuart, Swearingen, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, P. J. Wagner, Weller, T. W. Williams, and H. Williams—84.

So the House refused to suspend the rules, it requiring two-thirds to suspend.

[When the name of Mr. NISBET was called, he rose and stated that he voted against the suspension, because the resolution recognised the right of the House to act on this question.]

Mr. WISE then moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of offering the resolution submitted by him on yesterday, which was a different resolution from the one which had just been presented to the House. His resolution denied the reception of Abolition petitions; the one which the House had just refused to admit, contemplated their reception. His was a Southern resolution, the other was a Northern resolution. His resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, That upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid upon the table, without further debate or further action thereon.

Mr. GRANGER inquired if it was in order to move again to suspend the rules to admit this resolution, the House having once refused to suspend the rules for the admission of this same resolution. He wished to know whether the right of petition was thus to be stifled in advance.

The CHAIR said it was in order to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WISE said he moved to suspend the rules to admit this resolution, and he would continue to make this motion, until he got a distinct vote upon it, if it consumed hours every day.

Mr. ADAMS wished to know if the CHAIR decided that a motion for a specific object, which had been rejected by the House, could be moved every day. Could a gentleman move every day to suspend the rules to admit a resolution which the House had refused to receive?

The CHAIR was of opinion that the gentleman could move to suspend the rules to-day, as there might be a reason which induced the House not to suspend yesterday, which did not exist to-day.

Mr. ADAMS believed that there was a rule of the House, which declared that when a proposition was once rejected by the House, it was not in order again to introduce it. If the CHAIR made a decision that this motion could be made every morning, and the gentleman carried out his threat that he would move it every day, the whole session may be consumed by motions of this kind, calling the yeas and nays upon them, and debating them.

Mr. WISE. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the CHAIR?

Mr. ADAMS was unwilling to appeal from the decision of the CHAIR; but if this decision was adhered to, and the gentleman from Virginia attempted to carry out his threat, the House would find it necessary to reverse the decision.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS hoped the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his motion, so that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. CHINN] might be enabled to submit one which he had prepared, which was entirely different from that of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WISE could not withdraw this proposition, which he had prepared after due deliberation.

Mr. PICKENS desired to make an observation in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

The CHAIR called to order.

Mr. PICKENS continued. He was in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] but he thought it was very similar to the one introduced by the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. COLES;] both, according to strict parliamentary rule, held the question of reception in abeyance.

Mr. DOIG called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules, which were ordered, and were—yeas 87, nays 85, not two-thirds, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, W. O. Butler, Bynum, Carter, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Crabb, Crockett, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Doig, Eastman, Fisher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, Hill of Virginia, Hill of N. Carolina, Hillen, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Jos. Johnson, Wm. Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Keim, Kemble, King, Leonard, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Paynter, Pickens, Pope, Ramsey, Rayner, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Taliaferro, Taylor, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, David D. Wagner, Warren, Watterson, Weller, John White, Jared W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Barnard, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Carr, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Davies, Doan, Duncan, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Green, Hall, Hand, Wm. S. Hastings, J. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, Jackson, James, Charles Johnston, Kemphall, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Lowell, Mallory, Marvin, Medill, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Storrs, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweeny, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—85.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. CHINN then moved to supend the rules for the purpose of submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, and addresses of every description, touching the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the States or Territories, or in any manner relating to the existence of slavery or the slave trade in the United States, be referred, without debate, to a select committee.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules, which were ordered, and were—yeas 112, nays 66, not two-thirds, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earle, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Galbraith, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graves, Green, Hall, Hand, William S. Hastings, Hoffman, Jackson, James, Charles Johnston, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lincoln, McCulloh, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Montanya, Morgan, Sam'l W. Morris, C. Morris, Newhard, Ogle, Osborn, Palen, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Sergeant, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Storrs, Strong, Taylor, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Weller, Edward D White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—112.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alford, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Black, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Anson Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Chapman, Coles, Colquitt, Crabb, Cross, Dawson, Dillett, Eastman, Fisher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Granger, Griffin, Habersham, J. Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hill of N. C. Hillen, Hillen, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Wm. C. Johnson, Cave Johnson, King, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Miller, Montgomery, Nisbet, Parish, Pickens, Pope, Rayner, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Stanly, Steenrod, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Watterson, and Lewis, Williams—66.

So the House refused to suspend the rules for this purpose.

Mr. SERGEANT moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 20th rule of the House be so altered, that the daily presentation of petitions be allowed for twenty days from this day.

On taking the question, tellers were called for, and Messrs. GRIFFIN and MONTGOMERY were appointed, who, on counting, reported 130 ayes, and 36 noes.

The rules, therefore, having been suspended, the question arose on the adoption of the resolution:

Mr. BYNUM expressed his hopes that the House would not pass that resolution at that time; and he called upon every gentleman from the slaveholding States to rise in defence of that interest which had been assaulted there that morning, and against which the power of that House was to be brought to bear. He did not intend to enter into a discussion of the subject of slavery; but as a Southern man, the subject having been left open, and they having been distinctly informed by two or three gentlemen, that petitions on that subject were to be introduced and discussed, he hoped that every Southern man, as well as every Northern man, friendly to the peace and safety of the South, would settle the question with regard to the introduction of such petitions before adopting the resolution before them. He had heard a proposition this morning which surprised and alarmed him. It was made by a Southern gentleman, to compromise that subject which admitted of no compromise. He hoped that no door would be left open for the introduction of Abolition petitions, which would be the case if the House passed the resolution. He hoped the yeas and nays would be taken on the question, and moved that it be taken that way.

Mr. CRABB rose to a question of order. It appeared to him as clear as the noonday sun, that this resolution was not in order for discussion. All that had been done by the House was the suspension of the rules, to enable the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his resolution. But there was another resolution of the House which he did not consider suspended, that required the resolution to lay over one day for consideration.

Mr. CRABB here read the rule he referred to.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was for a suspension of all the rules that prevented the reception of his resolution. It did not specify any particular rule, but included the one referred to by the gentleman from Alabama, as well as the others.

Mr. JENIFER said he had declined voting on both the questions presented this morning, in consequence of having paired off with an absent colleague; and it was, therefore, he wished to offer a few remarks, in order to prevent any misconstructions being put on his not voting. He understood the proposition now before the House, to be a provision for the reception of petitions daily for twenty days to come, inasmuch as the thirty days from the commencement of each session, within which the rules allowed petitions to be presented, had expired, after having been taken up with other business. Now, he further understood that this resolution was objected to on the ground that Abolition petitions might be forced upon the House if it should be adopted. He did not mean to argue the question as to the expediency of receiving Abolition petitions; but he must contend that there were others in the country who had a right to petition this House as well as the Abolitionists, and that it would be highly unjust to cut them off from a chance of being heard, because Abolitionists might also come in. He was not afraid of being called an Abolitionist, and did not consider those gentlemen the most strenuous opposers of Abolition who got up and made the most fuss about it. He was one of those who, admitting the right of the people to petition for a redress of grievances, yet believed that the House had a right to refuse any petition it thought proper. Mr. J. continued his remarks in support of the resolution, contending that it was right and proper to allow time for the reception of petitions, and that if they rejected the resolution it would have the effect of precluding a large portion of the people of the United States from presenting their petitions to the National Legislature.

Mr. LEWIS made a few observations in favor of the resolution. If they did not adopt it, he said, gentlemen would not get enough time during the whole of the ensuing session, to offer the petitions with which they were charged. If only one day in the week was allowed for petitions, as would be the case under the rules, without passing this resolution, that day would be taken up for the remainder of the session with the subject of Abolition. Petitions were first called by the CHAIR, from Maine; next was Massachusetts, and when they came to that State, an Abolition petition was invariably presented, which occupied the whole day. In consequence of the obstructions occasioned by Abolition petitions from Massachusetts, he had been kept for months without having a single opportunity of offering those which he had in his desk, waiting for it. He was very willing to refuse the reception of Abolition petitions altogether; but he could not agree to stop the way against all petitions of every other nature, because those on the subject of Abolition might be forced upon the House.

Mr. STANLY said that when a gentleman threw down a gauntlet to him in defence of Southern rights, he would go as far as he who went farthest. He would not, however, give his support to miserable, jaundiced resolutions, concocted in a caucus, like that of the last session.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. STANLY that it was not in order to discuss a resolution passed at the last session.

Mr. STANLY said he would vote for the resolution, because it was due to the whole country that petitions should be admitted, and he would not, for fear of having Abolition petitions presented, shut the door against all others. When the call had been made on him, as a Southern man, to go for Southern interests, he felt bound to say that he was as ready as any to go for the true interests of the South; and he, in his turn, called upon gentlemen to come up to the mark, and not content themselves with the adoption of a miserable resolution, made to protect hypocrites, that would be capable of one construction at the North, and another at the South.

Mr. HOFFMAN observed, that, by the rules of the House, the first thirty days of every session were allowed for the reception of petitions; but this period of the present session having been used up by the New Jersey question, the object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in offering his resolution, was nothing more than to allow the usual time for the presentation and reference of petitions. This being the simple question before the House, he was astonished to find that the gentleman from North Carolina called upon the members from the slaveholding States to be cautious how they admitted this proposition, lest petitions hostile to their interests might be brought in under it. It seemed strange to him, that every gentleman who had discussed this proposition, had considered it only on the ground whether it was favorable or unfavorable to the South. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] had warned his Southern friends of its danger to Southern interests. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] on the other hand, did not deem it so objectionable; though none of them seemed to consider that the North had any thing to do with the question. He would, therefore, inform gentlemen of all parts of the House, that he and his Northern friends had some interest in this matter.

Mr. STANLY explained that he had supported the resolution on the ground that the whole country was interested in the admission of petitions.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied that he was exceedingly sorry to have misrepresented his friend from North Carolina, for whose opinions he had the highest respect; and he was satisfied that whenever he differed with him, he himself was generally in the wrong. [Laughter.] He agreed with his friend from North Carolina that the whole country, the North and the South, was alike interested in the adoption of this resolution. Mr. H. referred to the number of petitions from the various sections of the Union, that would be cut off by an adherence to the rules, and particularly to those from Revolutionary soldiers; and he trusted that a resolution of this kind would not be bounded by sectional feelings of Southern or Northern men. All the States have, said he, Revolutionary soldiers; and he trusted that the door would be opened for the reception of their petitions for thirty days longer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland rose for the purpose of saying that he should vote with great pleasure for the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He thought it was due to the convenience of the members, as well as the interests of the country. He could say with the gentleman from Alabama, that he had had petitions in his desk for months—that he had been prevented from offering them on the only day in the week allowed for petitions, by an Abolition debate; and such would be the case for this session, if the resolution was not adopted.

Whilst up, he would say one word to his Southern friends. He wished every Southern man on that floor to speak for himself individually, and not for the South. He hoped all Southern gentlemen would adopt that vocabulary, and not raise their loud voices here as champions of the South. I allow no man, said Mr. J. to speak for me. I follow no file leader; and as a Southern man, and a Southern Representative, I speak for myself and my constituents alone. I am sick to death, continued Mr. J. of hearing men speak of the South—the South; and men, too, in whose trust the South would never repose their interests, and if they did, they would be sacrificed. He had been here for six years, and never raised his voice in favor of Southern rights; but whenever the time came when it would be necessary to defend them, he would be found in the front of the battle; though this he admitted would not be saying a great deal for his fortitude at least. Mr. J. spoke of the great inconvenience attending the presentation of petitions at the latter end of the session; in consequence of which the committees would be unable to report on them in time for the action of the House. In order that the committees might report on petitions early enough in the session for the House to act on them, and that they might protect, as well as separate, private interests from questions involving the great interests of the nation, it was essential that the resolution should be adopted, giving the twenty days in lieu of the thirty that had been consumed in the agitation of the New Jersey election questions.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana thought they were getting up something like a tempest in a teapot, and therefore called for the previous question.

Mr. BYNUM appealed to Mr. GARLAND to withdraw the motion for the previous question, as he had been attacked by three gentlemen on the opposite side, and had been grossly misrepresented, and he only wished to say a few words in reply to those gentleman, [Messrs. JOHNSON of Maryland, JENIFER, and STANLY.] He should think it hard if he were not granted this privilege.

Mr. GARLAND said he would not withdraw his motion for the previous question, which cut off further remarks on the subject.

Mr. BYNUM then said that it was the usual practice of that party, after having two or three bullies to attack a gentleman and do him injustice, to refuse to let him reply to such attacks.

Mr. BLACK inquired if it was in order to amend the resolution after the call of the previous question.

The CHAIR said that it was not; but that the gentleman could move to lay the call for the previous question on the table. If, however, he succeeded in his motion, it would not then be in order for him to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLACK then submitted an amendment, which was read for the information of the House, the purport of which was to allow of the reception of all petitions for twenty days, with the exception of those relating to the subject of Abolition.

The CHAIR having decided the amendment to be out of order,

Mr. BLACK observed that unless it was received, he would vote against the resolution.

The question was then taken on seconding the call for the previous question, and carried—ayes 114, noes not counted.

The question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was taken and carried; after which,

The main question on the adoption of the resolution was then put and carried without a division.

Mr. EVANS moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. DOIG moved to amend the motion by substituting Thursday instead of Friday.

Mr. ALFORD moved further to amend, by substituting to-morrow instead of Friday.

The SPEAKER, according to the rules, put the question first in the farthest day off; and tellers having been called for, Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, and WILLIAMS of Kentucky, were appointed, who, on counting, reported 95 ayes, 52 noes.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that 5,000 copies of the map of the seat of war in Florida accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, be printed for the use of the House; which motion was adopted.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, enclosing certain documents from the Treasury Department, in relation to a decision made by the Circuit Court of the United States for the first circuit, as to the papers generally used by vessels engaged in the whale fisheries, which,

On motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, also, the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress copies of a communication from Governor Lucas, and of additional documents in relation to the disputed boundary line between the Territory of Iowa and the State of Missouri. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30, 1839.

On motion of Mr. W. W. CHAPMAN, said communication and documents were referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Also, the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I communicate to Congress a report from the Secretary of State in relation to applications on the part of France for the extension to vessels coming from the colonies of French Guiana and Senegal, of the benefits granted by the act of 9th May, 1828, to vessels of the same nation, coming from the islands of Guadaloupe and Martinique, and for the repayment of duties levied in the district of Newport upon the French ship "Alexandre" and part of her cargo. The circumstances under which these duties were demanded, being, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, of a character to entitle the parties to relief, I recommend the adoption of the necessary legislative provisions to authorize their employment. I likewise invite your attention to the evidence contained in the accompanying documents as to the treatment of our vessels in the port of Cayenne, which will doubtless be found by Congress such as to authorize the application, to French vessels coming from that colony, of the liberal principles which have hitherto governed the action of the Legislature in analogous cases. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, Dec 31, 1839.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, ordered to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

A communication from the Executive enclosing a report from the Secretary of State on the subject of the law for taking the sixth census of the United States, which was, on motion of Mr. R. GARLAND, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of 19th February, 1839, reporting a plan for the reorganization of the Navy Department, so as to dispense with the Board of Navy Commissioners.

On motion of Mr. RICE GARLAND, it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

The House then adjourned till Friday next.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 3, 1840.

The Hon. NATHAN F. DIXON, elected by the Legislature of Rhode Island, a Senator from that State, for six years from the 4th March last; and

The Hon. FELIX GRUNDY, elected by the Legislature of Tennessee, a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th March last;

Appeared, were qualified, and took their seats in the Senate this morning

The CHAIR submitted to the Senate the following documents:

A message from the President of the United States, communicating additional information in relation to the disputed boundary line between the State of Michigan and Territory of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the President of the United States, respecting the extension of the same privileges to French vessels coming from Guiana and Senegal, as those from Guadaloupe and Martinique; and also in relation to the duties exacted on the cargo of the French ship Alexandre, at Newport; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the fiscal regulations of foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

A report from the Posmaster General, showing the names and salaries of the clerks employed in that Department during the year 1839; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the petition of citizens of township 2, range 2, east, of Huntsville land district, praying for the privilege of relinquishing the sixteenth section; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, the petition of the corporate authorities of the city of Mobile; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Miguel Eslava; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. SOUTHARD, the petition and papers of Eliza Laurie, on file, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KING presented the petition of J. B. Hancock, who was entitled to a reservation of land by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, but had not received the same, praying Congress to grant relief; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER presented a petition from certain officers of the army, praying for an equalization of pay, and that the officers of the staff may be separated from the line of the army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of John Foy, for a confirmation of title; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the papers on file in the case of Ezra Chapman were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Hannah Allen and David Green; which were severally referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petitions of William Ferguson, Elisha Bentley, and Frederick Sammons; which were severally referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the petition of certain manufacturers of wool, praying for a revision of the revenue laws, asked that that committee should be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh, and Co.; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CALHOUN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to cede the public lands within the limits of the new States, upon certain conditions therein mentioned; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill fixing the salaries of several district judges of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STRANGE, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend "an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, approved the 2d day of March, 1807."

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred that part of the President's message relating to military affairs, reported a bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of the Territory of Florida overrun by bands of marauding Indians; which was made the special order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following resolution, which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, be necessary to confirm to the State of Indiana the land claimed and selected by her under the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1827, entitled "An act to grant a certain quantity of land to the State of Indiana for the purpose of aiding the State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Wabash with those of Lake Erie," for that portion of the canal between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and that document No. 32, in vol. 3, of the House of Representatives Executive Documents of the Twenty-fifth Congress, be referred to said committee.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky gave notice, that tomorrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill in relation to copy rights.

Mr. C. stated that he regretted that he was detained by indisposition this morning, and prevented from being present when the bill was introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] for ceding the public lands to certain States within which they are situated. He had wished to suggest some other reference of it than to the Committee on the Public Lands; but, unless some Senator would move a reconsideration of the order of reference to that committee, he could not offer the suggestion which he wished to make.

Mr. SOUTHARD then moved the reconsideration.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that he hoped the Senate would not agree to the motion, unless some good reason should be assigned why the bill should not be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. It was the appropriate committee, and the bill referred itself to it as a matter of course, unless there should be some specific and sufficient objection.

Mr. CLAY said he was indifferent as to the disposition of the matter, but, as the committee was constituted, four of its five members were from the new States. He meant to offer no disrespect to them; but he must say that this was a measure which, disguised as it may be, and colorable as its provisions were, was, in effect, a donation of upwards of one hundred millions of acres of the common property of all the States of this Union to particular States. He did not think it right that such a measure should be committed to the hands of Senators exclusively representing the donees. He thought that a committee ought to be constituted in which the old States should have a fuller and fairer representation. We should at least preserve the decorum of legislation, and not violate the decencies of justice.

Whilst up, Mr. CLAY would be glad to learn whether the Administration is in favor of or against this measure, or stands neutral and uncommitted. this inquiry he should not make, if the recent relations, between the Senator who introduced this bill and the head of that Administration, continued to exist; but rumors, of which the city, the circles, and the press are full, assert that those relations are entirely changed, and have, within a few days, been substituted by others of an intimate, friendly, and confidential nature. And shortly after the time when this new state of things is alleged to have taken place, the Senator gave notice of his intention to move to introduce this bill. Whether this motion has or has not any connection with that adjustment of former differences, the public would, he had no doubt, be glad to know. At all events, it is important to know in what relation of support, opposition, or neutrality, the Administration actually stands to this momentous measure; and he (Mr. C.) supposed that the Senator from South Carolina, or some other Senator, could communicate the desired information.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, that this was not the proper occasion to discuss the merits of the bill; but if it were, the task would be an easy one, to show that the Senator had most erroneously characterized it. The question at issue is on the reference, and he must express his surprise at the reason assigned by the Senator why it should not be referred to the committee to which it had been. His reason is, that the committee was, for the most part, composed of members from the new States, and who would, therefore, be too favorable to the bill. No one knew better than the Senator that all bills should be referred to committees favorable to them. There is no principle better established in the parliamentary code. It follows, that the very reason he has assigned for not making the reference, is the strongest to prove that it should be made.

But the Senator did not limit himself to objections to the reference. He introduced other and extraneous personal matter; and asked whether the bill had the sanction of the Executive, assigning as a reason for his inquiry, that, if rumor was to be credited, a change of personal relation had taken place between the President and myself within the last few days. He (Mr. C.) would appeal to the Senate whether it was decorous or proper that his personal relations should be drawn in question here. Whether he should establish or suspend personal relations with the President or any other person, is a private and personal concern, which belongs to himself individually to determine on the propriety, without consulting any one, much less the Senator. It was none of his concern, and he has no right to question me in relation to it.

But the Senator assumes that a change in my personal relations involves a change of political position; and it is on that he founds his right to make the inquiry. He judges, doubtless, by his own experience; but I would have him to understand, said Mr. C. that what may be true in his own case on a memorable occasion, is not true in mine. His political course may be governed by personal considerations, but mine, I trust, is governed strictly by my principles, and is not at all under the control of my attachments or enmities. Whether the President is personally my friend or enemy, has no influence over me in the discharge of my duties, as, I trust, my course has abundantly proved. Mr. C. concluded by saying, that he felt that these were improper topics to introduce here, and that he had passed over them as briefly as possible.

Mr. CLAY wished it to be understood, that his objections were not because the committee was composed of a majority who were friends of the measure, but that a majority were from the New States, who were deeply interested, and that this majority were to judge of the terms on which they would receive this magnificent donation. He contended that his question, as to whether this was an Administration measure or not, was a proper one, as it was important for the public information. He again referred to the rumors of Mr. CALHOUN's new relations with the President, and supposed from the declarations of the Senator, that these rumors were true; and that his support, if not pledged, was at least promised conditionally to the Administration. Was it of no importance to the public to learn that these pledges and compromises had been entered into?—that the distinguished Senator had made his bow in court, kissed the hand of the monarch, was taken into favor, and agreed henceforth to support his edicts?

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator had spoken much of pledges, understandings, and political compromises, and sudden change of personal relations. He (said Mr. C.) is much more experienced in such things than I am. If my memory serves me, and if rumors are to be trusted, the Senator had a great deal to do with such things, in connection with a distinguished citizen, now of the other House; and it is not at all surprising, from his experience then, in his own case, that he should not be indisposed to believe similar rumors of another now. But whether his sudden change of personal relations then, from bitter enmity to the most confidential friendship with that citizen, was preceded by pledges, understandings, and political compromises on the part of one or both, it is not for me to say. The country has long since passed on that.

But, said Mr. C. I will assure the Senator, if there were pledges in his case, there were none in mine. I have terminated my long suspended personal intercourse with the President, without the slightest pledge, understanding, or compromise, on either side. I would be the last to receive or exact such. The transition from their former to their present personal relation was easy and natural, requiring nothing of the kind. It gives me pleasure to say, thus openly, that I have approved of all the leading measures of the President, since he took the Executive chair, simply because they accord with the principles and policy on which I have long acted, and often openly avowed. The change, then, in our personal relations, had simply followed that of our political. Nor was it made suddenly, as the Senator charges. So far from it, more than two years have elapsed since I gave a decided support to the leading measure of the Executive, and on which almost all others since have turned. This long interval was permitted to pass, in order that his acts might give assurance whether there was a coincidence between our political views as to the principles on which the Government should be administered, before our personal relations should be changed. I deemed it due to both thus long to delay the change, among other reasons to discountenance such idle rumors as the Senator alludes to. That his political course might be judged (said Mr. CALHOUN) by the object he had in view, and not the suspicion and jealousy of his political opponents, he would repeat what he had said, at the last session, was his object. It is, said he, to obliterate all those measures which had originated in the national consolidation school of politics, and especially the Senator's famous American system, which he believed to be hostile to the Constitution and the genius of our political system, and the real source of all the disorders and dangers to which the country was, or had been, subject. This done, he was for giving the Government a fresh departure, in the direction in which Jefferson and his associates would give, were they now alive and at the helm. He stood where he had always stood, on the old State Rights ground. His change of personal relation, which gave so much concern to the Senator, so far from involving any change in his principles or doctrines, grew out of them.

Mr. CLAY said he had understood the Senator as felicitating himself on the opportunity which had been now afforded him by Mr. C. of defining once more his political position; and Mr. C. must say that he had now defined it very clearly, and had apparently given it a new definition. The Senator now declared that all the leading measures of the present Administration had met his approbation, and should receive his support. It turned out, then, that the rumor to which Mr. C. had alluded was true, and that the Senator from South Carolina might be hereafter regarded as a supporter of this Administration, since he had declared that all its leading measures were approved by him, and should have his support.

As to the allusion which the Senator from South Carolina had made in regard to Mr. C's support of the head of another Administration, (Mr. ADAMS,) it occasioned Mr. C. no pain whatever. It was an old story, which had long been sunk in oblivion, except when the Senator and a few others thought proper to bring it up. But what were the facts of that case? Mr. C. was then a member of the House of Representatives, to whom three persons had been returned, from whom it was the duty of the House to make a selection for the Presidency. As to one of those three candidates, he was known to be in an unfortunate condition, in which no one sympathized with him more than did Mr. C. Certainly the Senator from South Carolina did not. That gentleman was therefore out of the question as a candidate for the Chief Magistracy; and Mr. C. had consequently the only alternative of the illustrious individual at the Hermitage, or of the man who was now distinguished in the House of Representatives, and who had held so many public places with honor to himself, and benefit to the country. And if there was any truth in history, the choice which Mr. C. then made was precisely the choice which the Senator from South Carolina had urged upon his friends. The Senator himself had declared his preference of Adams to Jackson. Mr. C. made the same choice; and his constituents had approved it from that day to this, and would to eternity. History would ratify and approve it. Let the Senator from South Carolina make anything out of that part of Mr. C's public career if he could. Mr. C. defied him.

The Senator had alluded to Mr. C. as the advocate of compromise. Certainly he was. This Government itself, to a great extent, was founded and rested on compromise; and to the particular compromise to which allusion had been made, Mr. C. thought no man ought to be more grateful for it than the Senator from South Carolina. But for that compromise, Mr. C. was not at all confident that he would have now had the honor to meet that Senator face to face in this national Capitol.

The Senator had said that his own position was that of State Rights. But what was the character of this bill? It was a bill to strip seventeen of the States of their rightful inheritance; to sell it all for a mess of pottage; to surrender it for a trifle—a mere nominal sum. The bill was, in effect, an attempt to strip and rob seventeen States of this Union of their property, and assign it over to some eight or nine of the States. If this was what the Senator called vindicating the rights of the States, Mr. C. prayed God to deliver us from all such rights and all such advocates.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that he would not be forced, at this stage, into a discussion on the merits of the bill; but when the proper time arrived, he would show that the Senator was entirely mistaken as to its character, in supposing it made a gift of the public lands to the States in which they lay. So far otherwise, it secured one-half of the whole of the gross proceeds of the States to the Government, throwing the whole burden and expense of administration on the new States. He would not be surprised, if, on a fair statement of the account, the Government would receive as much, under the bill, as under the present system. It was, besides, not only consistent with State Rights, but grew out of them; while, at the same time, he verily believed the measure was essential to the peace and harmony of the Union.

The Senator has said, Mr. President, that I, of all men, ought to be grateful to him for the compromise act.

[Mr. CLAY. I did not say "to me."]

The Senator claims to be the author of that measure, and, of course, if there be any gratitude due, it must be to him. I, said Mr. CALHOUN, made no allusion to that act, but as the Senator has thought proper to refer to it, and claim my gratitude, I, in turn, now tell him I feel not the least gratitude towards him for it. The measure was necessary to save the Senator politically; and as he has alluded to the subject, both on this and on a former occasion, I feel bound to explain what might otherwise have been left in oblivion. The Senator was then compelled to compromise to save himself. Events had placed him flat on his back, and he had no way to recover himself but by the compromise. This is no after thought. I wrote more than half a dozen of letters home at the time to that effect. I shall now explain.

When a minority forces a dominant majority, (which has converted power into an instrument of oppression,) by State interposition, or nullification, if you please, to take that by force which they had taken under color of law, those who receive the least share of the spoils, will not be disposed to resort to the hazard of force. Such was the case of the Senator's constituents. They received, under his American system, a miserable pittance, or rather no pittance at all; and he would have found it a difficult task to bring them to sustain his system by force, as he must have clearly seen.

But this was not the only, or even the principal difficulty with him. The proclamation and message of Gen. Jackson necessarily rallied around him all the steadfast friends of the Senator's system. They withdrew their allegiance at once from him, and transferred it to Gen. Jackson. The Senator was thus left in the most hopeless condition, with no more weight with his former partisans than this sheet of paper, (raising a sheet from his desk.) This is not all. The position which Gen. Jackson had assumed, necessarily attracted towards him a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, not now here, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who, it is clear, would have reaped all the political honors and advantages of the system, had the contest come to blows. These causes made the political condition of the Senator truly forlorn at the time. On him rested all the responsibility, as the author of the system; while all the power and influence it gave, had passed into the hands of others. Compromise was the only means of extrication. He was thus forced by the action of the State which I in part represent against his system, by my counsel to compromise, in order to save himself. I had the mastery over him on the occasion. I have never taken any credit for my agency in the compromise act. I claim a higher—that of compelling the compromise; and I would have dictated my terms, which was to allow to the year 1840 for the reduction, taking off one-seventh annually of all duties above fifteen per cent. had not circumstances, not proper to explain here, prevented it. My colleague knows, I believe, to what I allude, though I am not certain. I never contemplated a sudden reduction of duties; I knew it would be ruinous. I never desired to destroy the manufactures, and at no time contemplated a full reduction under six or seven years.

But although I feel none of that gratitude the Senator claims, yet I am willing to acknowledge that he is not without merit for his course on the occasion. It was something to serve the country, though it was necessary to save himself from political ruin. I accordingly conceded to him cheerfully the sagacity of seeing what was necessary to himself, and the skill and judgment with which he united it with a measure highly beneficial to the country. But his course on this and another memorable occasion has cancelled what claims he may have had on me, and, I might add, on the State I represent, and the whole South.

Mr. CLAY was sorry to be obliged to prolong this discussion; but the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina rendered it necessary to add a few remarks in vindication of himself. He made no allusion, he said, to the compromise bill, till it was done by the Senator from South Carolina himself; he made no reference to the events of 1825 until the Senator himself had set him the example; and he had not in the slightest and the most distant manner alluded to Nullification until after the Senator himself had called it up. The Senator ought not to have introduced that subject, especially when he had gone over to the authors of the force bill and the proclamation. The Senator from South Carolina said that he (Mr. C.) was flat on his back, and that he was my master. Sir, I would not own him as my slave. He my master! and I compelled by him! And, as if it were impossible to go far enough in one paragraph, he refers to certain letters of his own to prove that I was flat on my back! and, that I was not only on my back, but another Senator and the President had robbed me! I was flat on my back, and unable to do any thing but what the Senator from South Carolina permitted me to do!

Why, sir, (said Mr. C.) I gloried in my strength, and was compelled to introduce the compromise bill; and compelled, too, by the Senator, not in consequence of the weakness, but of the strength, of my position. If it was possible for the Senator from South Carolina to introduce one paragraph without showing the egotism of his character, he would not now acknowledge that he wrote letters home to show that he (Mr. C.) was flat on his back, while he was indebted to him for that measure which relieved him from the difficulties in which he was involved. Now, what was the history of the case? Flat as he was on his back, Mr. C. said he was able to produce that compromise, and to carry it through the Senate, in opposition to the most strenuous exertions of the gentleman who, the Senator from South Carolina said, had supplanted him, and in spite of his determined and unceasing opposition. There was (said Mr. C.) a sort of necessity operating on me to compel me to introduce that measure. No necessity of a personal character influenced him; but considerations involving the interests, the peace and harmony of the whole country, as well as of the State of South Carolina, directed him in the course he pursued. He saw the condition of the Senator from South Carolina and that of his friends; he saw the condition to which he had reduced the gallant little State of South Carolina by his unwise and dangerous measures; he saw, too, than we were on the eve of a civil war; and he wished to save the effusion of blood—the blood of our own fellow-citizens. That was one reason why he introduced the compromise bill. There was another reason that powerfully operated on him. The very interest that the tariff laws were enacted to protect—so great was the power of the then Chief Magistrate, and so rapidly was that power increasing—was in danger of being sacrificed. He saw that the protective system was in danger of being swept away entirely, and probably at the next session of Congress, by the tremendous power of the individual who then filled the Executive chair, and he felt that the greatest service that he could render it, would be to obtain for it "a lease for a term of years," to use an expression that had been heretofore applied to the compromise bill. He saw the necessity that existed to save the protective system from the danger which threatened it. He saw the necessity to advance the great interests of the nation, to avert civil war, and to restore peace and harmony to a distracted and divided country; and it was the love that he had brought forward this measure. The Senator from South Carolina, to betray still further and more strikingly the characteristics which belonged to him, said, that in consequence of his (Mr. C's) remarks this very day, all obligations towards him on the part of himself, [Mr. CALHOUN,] of the State of South Carolina, and the whole South, were cancelled. And what right had the Senator to get up and assume to speak of the whole South, or even of South Caro-ina hereself. If he was not mis'aken in his judgment of the political signs of the times, and if the information which came to him was to be relied on, a day would come, and that not very distant neither, when the Senator would not dare to rise in his place and presume to speak as he had this day done, as the organ of the gallant peop'e of the State he represented. As to cancelment of obligations, he was not one of those looking out to see what would enure to him in consequence of them; but he contented himself with having performed his duty to the best of his ability, and that was the highest reward that his ambition ever aimed at. His race was nearly run—run by the course of nature—run, if you please, by the course of political events; and he had nothing to ask for from South Carolina, the South at large, or the whole country—nothing. But he should go, when he chose to do so, into retirement, with a consciousness that, during the period of a long and eventful life, he had served his country faithfully, zealously, without being influenced by hope of reward, or any other motives than a sincere desire to promote its best interests; and whatever the Senator from South Carolina might say as to the cancellment of obligations, he could not deprive him of that delightful consciousness.

Mr. CALHOUN. The Senator brings against me the vague charge of egotism. He would appeal to the Senate, in order to repel it, whether there is any member of the body more exempt from speaking of himself than he was, unless when attacked. How stands the fact? The Senator has made it his practice of late to give all his discussions with him a personal turn. What was he to do? If he repelled his attacks, he was forced to speak of himself, and to expose himself to the charge of egotism from the Senator; or, if he remained silent, to stand convicted of his charges. Is that fair? He has another practice, not less unfair, to make an attack on him, and to turn round and accuse him of making the attack, when he simply repelled it, as in the present instance.

He accuses me of reverting to the part he took in the transactions of 1825. He mistakes my object entirely in referring to those old transactions. It was not to make a charge against him, but to make him feel that he was the last man who ought to make the accusation he has on the present occasion. The course of the Senator, and that of myself, is directly the opposite. He has a land bill of his own. He brings it in; he refers it to what committee he chooses, without any interference on my part, or any personal attack on him; but I cannot make a move without his interference and attack. But enough of this.

I rose simply to supply some remarks which I intended to make when last up. The Senator said, as I understood him, that it was matter of history, that I preferred the candidate on whom he cast his vote for the Presidency in 1825. I know not if there be a page of history to that effect. I have never seen it, and if there be, it is false. The truth of the case is, that I was opposed to Mr. Crawford, for reasons which I need not now state, as were Mr. Adams and Gen. Jackson. When my name was withdrawn from the list of candidates for the Presidency, it was placed on the ticket of both those candidates for the Vice Presidency; and between them I took no part, as in decorum, I ought not. When I was elected Vice President, the same, and even higher considerations, prevented me from using any influence as between them, when the election went to the House.

Mr. CLAY wished to add one word more. He made the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, to know whether this great measure which contemplated the cession to the new States of such a vast domain, was connected with, or had received the sanction of the Administration or not. He merely made the inquiry, and if the "galled jade winced," it was not his fault. He made no allusion, for the purpose of wounding the feelings of the Senator from South Carolina. He said that new relations had arisen between that gentleman and the Administration, and therefore, he made the inquiry of him. Was it wrong in him to ask if this great measure had the support of his new friends? The Senator, instead of answering this plain inquiry, flew into a passion, and cancelled all obligations he was under towards him; but if he had only said, "I know nothing of the views of the Administration; I introduce my own measure on my own responsibility," there would have been no controversy between them. The Senator, therefore brought this controversy on himself.

Mr. WALKER observed that it was only necessary to look back to the stage of the business when the bill of the gentleman from South Carolina was introduced, to show how the controversy between him and the Senator from Kentucky commenced. The latter, in his opening speech, commenced with an inquiry from the former, as to whether his bill was or was not an Executive measure. Now, he apprehended, if the Senator from Kentucky had directed his attention to the time and circumstances under which this bill was originally introduced, his question would have been answered. The bill now introduced was not a new measure. It was first proposed during the session of 1836–'7, more than two years ago, when none of the rumors in regard to a change of position by the Senator from South Carolina were in agitation. It was when that gentleman was regarded by many as an opponent instead of a friend of the Administration; and he (Mr. W.) thought that this circumstance of itself was sufficient to furnish an answer to the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Kentucky. But the Senator from Kentucky objected to the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Public Lands. Was not that, he would ask, the appropriate committee to consider a bill of that nature? Was not that the committee to which it naturally belonged? And must there not be, on any committee to which it might be referred, a majority of members either from the old or the new States, the committee being five in number? But let me say to the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. W. continued, that the period has passed when he can consider the State of Mississippi, in reference to this measure, as deeply interested. The returns from the General Land Office show that that State at least has but little connection with the sales of the public lands. A reference to the sales of the public lands in Mississippi for the past year, will show that that State had been swept of nearly all its lands that were of any value, and that the quota of that State will amount to less than 30,000 dollars. And are we to be told that Mississippi, whose gross proceeds will amount to but 30,000 dollars, will be tempted to plunder the old States? But the bill did not deserve the character which the Senator from Kentucky had given to it. If it did, it ought to be told to the country. It did not propose an unconditional surrender as the Senator from Kentucky intimated; but it was a surrender on certain conditions expressed in the bill. These were, that the Government of the United States was to receive one-half, not of the nett proceeds, but of the gross proceeds of the sales of the public lands, while all the expense of conducting the sales was to be borne by the new States. The effect of this bill would be to sweep off at one blow, a considerable item of public expenditure, and one branch of Executive patronage. It would diminish, to the amount of nearly one million of dollars, the expenditures of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury told us that the probable gross proceeds of the sales would in future amount to $3,500,000, one half of which would go to the Government of the United States. Let me tell the Senator from Kentucky, said Mr. W. that if it can be shown that this measure is, as he contends, a robbery of the old States, I would misrepresent my own State if I would consent that it should become a law. Let it be shown that it is unjust to either the old or the new States, and it never shall receive my vote.

Mr. GRUNDY said that he should vote against the motion for reconsideration, as he considered the reference an appropriate one; but he did not wish his vote to be considered as an intimation that he was in favor of the bill. He had formerly opposed this measure, and thought it probable he would oppose it again when it came before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN said he was about rising when he was anticipated by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and with the same view. He thought the Committee on the Public Lands the appropriate one to which this matter should be referred. He would therefore vote against the motion for reconsideration, but he did not intend thereby to express any opinion in favor of or against the measure itself.

Mr. PRESTON said this bill would have a paramount effect on the finances of the country. It was a question whether it would not increase taxation. In this view it was important, and Mr. P. therefore preferred that it should go to the Committee on Finance. He should therefore vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. CALHOUN said the bill, as he had drawn it, would lead to no reduction of the revenue. It was not to go into operation till June, 1842, thus leaving time to adjust the tariff. He saw no reason why it should be taken from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WHITE said he was entirely ignorant of the contents of this bill; but if the reference should be reconsidered, the bill could then be read, and he would be better able to decide to which committee it was most appropriate. He thought the committee to which it was referred should be friendly to its object, so as to give it all the strength they could by bringing its merits prominently forward, and he thought it probable that the Committee on the Public Lands was the appropriate one. He voted, by a silent acquiescence, for its commitment, but not being aware of its contents at the time, he would now vote for its reconsideration.

Mr. CALHOUN called for the reading of the bill, which was read accordingly.

The question of reconsidering the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands was then put, and decided by yeas and nays in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dickson, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Wall, and White of Tennessee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tappan, Walker, White of Indiana, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

Mr. KING, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of John H. Jacocks.

M. K. stated that the person who was intended to be benefitted by this bill was in very straitened circumstances, and the amount appropriated was but four hundred and thirty dollars. It had passed unanimously last session, without commitment, on account of the necessities of the case; and he hoped that, by unanimous consent, the bill would be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

In accordance with this suggestion, the bill was accordingly considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which they had been referred, reported the following bills without amendment:

A bill for the discontinuance of the office of Surveyor General in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and to abolish the officer of Solicitor of the General Land Office; and

A bill to relinquish a certain reversionary interest of the United States to a tract of land in the State of Alabama.

Mr. MERRICK, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill concerning the estates of infants and lunatics in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had had been referred the bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Barbour, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill granting to the State of Michigan a quantity of land to aid in constructing a canal around the falls of Ste. Marie.

A bill granting to the county of Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land, and for other purposes.

A bill granting to certain persons therein named, the right of pre-emption to a fraction of a section of land in Ottoway, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the Two per cent. fund arising under her compact for admission into the Union, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. made some remarks as to the necessity of an early passage of the bill, and at his suggestion, and by unanimous consent, it was then taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, also reported the following bills without amendment:

A bill for the relief of James Dutton; and

A bill to authorize the substitution of other lands in place of school sections which are useless or unproductive.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana presented the remonstrance of the settlers upon certain lots of land adjoining the town of Milwaukie, against the confirmation of the title of Francis Laventure and others, who claim a pre-emption right, and a petition for an act granting a special pre-emption to the occupants of those lots: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, a memorial of the merchants of Albion, Mount Carmel, and Princeton, praying for aid to construct the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana offered the following resolution, which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of regulating and establishing the salaries of the district judges of the United States.

Mr. NICHOLAS gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to revive the act entitled an act to enable claimants to land, within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, approved May 26, 1834, and an act amending the same, and to extend the provisions of said acts to claimants to lands within the State of Louisiana.

Mr. YOUNG gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to introduce several bills for the relief of individuals, and one in relation to the Galena Railroad.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed respectfully to request annually of the Governors of the different States and Territories of the United States to furnish, for the use of the Congressional Library, all reports and documents in their possession in relation to the geology and mineralogy of their respective States and Territories.

The resolutions submitted on Tuesday by Mr. BENTON and Mr. WALL, were severally considered and agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes, was taken up on its third reading, and passed.

The bill to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States, or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed foa third reading.

The Senate then went into Executive business, and afterwards

Adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 3, 1840.

After the journal was read,

Mr. JENIFER rose and asked the indulgence of the House whilst he called their attention, for a few moments, in relation to a matter personally concerning himself.

I do not rise to ask a correction of the journal, but for the purpose of pointing the attention of gentlemen to a report of the proceedings which took place on Tuesday last.

In the Globe of Tuesday evening, which purports to give a sketch of the debate upon the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] "to alter the 20th rule of the House, to allow further time for the daily presentation of petitions," I find the following remarks:

"Mr. BYNUM appealed to Mr. GARLAND to withdraw the motion for the previous question, as he had been attacked by three gentlemen on the opposite side, and had been grossly misrepresented, and he only wished to say a few words in reply to those gentlemen, [Messrs. JOHNSON of Maryland, JENIFER, and STANLY.] He should think it hard if he were not granted this privilege.

"Mr. GARLAND said he would not withdraw his motion for the previous question, which cut off further remarks on the subject.

"Mr. BYNUM then said that it was the usual practice of that party, after having two or three bullies to attack a gentleman and do him injustice, to refuse to let him reply to such attacks."

The distance of my seat from the member from North Carolina, and the usual want of order in the hall, prevented me from distinctly hearing what was said upon that occasion. Three days having elapsed since these remarks appeared in the Globe, and, as far as I have seen, without correction, I am left to infer that they were either expressed on the floor, or authorized to be reported. Had I heard them, I do not know that I should have noticed them, well knowing that they would be properly appreciated by gentlemen here. But as they have been published in the columns of the Globe and sent throughout the country, it may be expected that some response should be given.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not rise to complain; that I do not feel aggrieved; that I take no offence at whatever may have been said, or reported to have been said, coming from that quarter.

Still, a regard for the kind opinion of friends, and a respect for myself, which I hope ever to retain, requires that I should define my position in relation to the member from North Carolina.

Since the 7th day of June, 1836, (a day which that member no doubt well remembered,) I have purposely avoided noticing any thing he might say, or in any manner coming in contact with him, well knowing that no laurels are to be gained, where even victory would be a disgrace. Under these circumstances, my friends need feel no apprehension on my account. But to prevent misunderstanding, and do justice to myself, I desire it to be also understood, that if, upon any occasion, I have, or hereafter may, wound the feelings of any gentleman, I shall always hold myself bound to make an honorable atonement, or meet him in an honorable way; but he must be a gentleman worthy the notice of an honorable man.

Mr. BYNUM said he rose to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] although he was sorry that he could not hear distinctly what that gentleman had said. He understood him, however, to complain of something that had been published in the Globe, in relation to what he (Mr. B.) had said some days since. He had not been able to understand what censure that gentleman had passed on him, if any. He would state, though, for his satisfaction, and all others, that the Globe contained what he had uttered on the floor, at the time alluded to by that gentleman, to the best of his recollection. The language was his, and for it he held himself responsible, in that House or out of it. The only explanation that he felt a disposition to make to the House was this:

On the occasion alluded to, he had been attacked by three or four gentlemen—by the gentleman himself [Mr. JENIFER] and his colleague, [Mr. JOHNSON,] a gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] and a member from North Carolina. He, however, was not disposed to notice what, as he then thought, was the most illiberal manner, in which, by the want of courtesy, he was prevented from a reply, in vindication of himself and the remarks he had used on that occasion, to the attacks of those gentlemen, in which he thought he had been grossly misrepresented; and which he should have attempted to show, if he could have been allowed the privilege of replying at the time. At the time he made the remarks, he did not know whether that gentleman [Mr. JENIFER] was in his seat or not. The gentleman thought fit, however, to open the attack upon him, and was then followed up by his colleague and others; although the gentleman had said he had lain down a particular rule for himself to pursue, since the memorable 7th of June, 1836, and that course was to have nothing to do with me; and, to avoid me in debate. Sir, such was the identical course that I had laid down for myself to pursue towards that gentleman, and several others with whom my relations were of a peculiar nature. I take it for granted that it is dishonorable, after two gentlemen have had a difference, that has been confessedly settled honorably to both parties, and stand upon peculiar terms, to embrace any public occasion to renew their difficulties, by bandying personal epithets. Sir, that has not been my course here or elsewhere, as I do not conceive that that belongs to an honorable man and a gentleman. The word bully, that I used, if it be that the gentleman complains of, I used to denote one that would play the political champion of this House, such as we have frequently witnessed in it for several years past. I thought every man understood it, when I used it, in that sense, and I regret that any man should have brought it before this House. I do not know what the gentleman has said about the affair of the 7th of June; but if he says or insinuates that that affair was not honorably settled by both parties then, he says or insinuates what he did not say nor insinuate on the ground; and he contradicts what was said and done then; but I say I did not hear the gentleman, and do not know exactly what he did say. If the gentleman will harrow up that old affair, which all understood was honorably settled at the time, then let him proceed. Or if he should undertake to pounce on me, to become my lecturer here, or elsewhere, I say to him, that this House is not large enough to hold us both. No, sir, this House cannot hold us both, nor the world retain us alive. I regret that these private matters should ever have been brought before this House; they do not belong it.

Mr. STANLY here rose, and put an interrogatory to Mr. BYNUM, to which he wished a reply; but was not distinctly heard by the Reporter.

Mr. BYNUM said that the member had asked for a civil answer to a question which he said he had put in a civil way. If the member was in earnest, and could be relied on, he had no objection to answering any civil question put to him in a proper spirit.

Mr. STANLY was understood to ask of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] if the word "bully," or "political champion," was intended by him in an offensive sense? whether he intended it to have a literal or political construction?

Mr. BYNUM said he did not know that he could make any other explanation to the question than he had given. He had said that he had used the word "bully" in the sense he had explained before; which was one who was in the habit of thrusting himself on every occasion in debate, and endeavoring to browbeat and bully others out of their opinions; and if that was not satisfactory, the member might act as he chose in relation to it, as he had no further explanation to make.

Mr. STANLY was then understood to proceed as though unsatisfied.

The SPEAKER here interposed to put a stop to the discussion, which he said was of such a nature as could not be permitted to go on; and that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] had merely risen, as he understood him, to make some correction of a matter which personally interrested him.

Mr. STANLY was again understood to say that reference had been made to him by his colleague, [Mr. BYNUM,] in his reply to the gentleman from Maryland, which he conceived needed some notice. He said it was usual with him to cultivate with gentlemen the most friendly relations—and particularly so with persons from the State which he in part represented—that he felt his heart warmed to meet any such; but on his arrival here he had cautioned his friends and colleagues not to introduce him to his colleague, [Mr. BYNUM,] for if they did he would hold them personally responsible. He made some further remarks not heard sufficiently distinct to be understood.

Mr. BYNUM said that this place was not the proper one to settle these private matters. If the member would but go to the Rotunda, he would satisfy him. To which Mr. S. made no reply, but said something, as he sat down, about Mr. B. begging his life, which was not understood. Mr. B. then rose and said, "When and where, puppy, puppy, puppy?" and the matter here closed.

Mr. KEIM rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have made an effort this morning to present to this House the usual resolutions of tribute to the memory of a deceased friend and colleague—a duty which required an earlier attention, but from the delay in our organization, it was always unpleasant to my feelings to offer them, until the restoration of order, and the House itself had once again returned to its proper and characteristic decorum. It appears to me that now is the proper moment, as it may allay, in some degree, the smothered passions which unfortunately seem to be gathering around some of the gentlemen upon this floor; for I am sure the hand of death has been too busy during the past year, to need any additional provocation from them in aid of his relentless power. Indeed, from that ruthless spoiler who can escape? The old, the young, the humble, and the great, are alike stricken with his unerring shaft, and we perchance are left to mourn a desolation which sooner or later also awaits us.

To some, however, death presents no terror, but like a welcome harbinger of rest, he is hailed with cordial greeting, and dying friends are looked upon as > "—Pioneers to smooth

> Our rugged way, to break
> Those bars of terror and abhorrence nature throws
> Cross our obstructed path, and thus to make > Welcome as safe our port from every storm."

Few, however, have left this earthly tenement, more to be lamented than my friend and colleague, WILLIAM W. POTTER; for none possessed more amiable qualities, or enjoyed a more virtuous heart.

His assiduous attention to his duties here promoted a disease that baffled all human skill, and marked him as a premature victim to its ravages. With a consciousness of his approaching end, he was fully prepared to "return the dust to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it." Thus, in the meridian of his days, was taken from us a mind replete with all the acquirements that a patriot cherished, or a statesman prized.

Indefatigable in his services to his constituents, their tears have designated how well they loved him who never betrayed their confidence, or faltered in devotion to their best interests.

As a husband, he was exemplary for his affection and kindness; and none can soothe the anguish of the partner of his bosom, save "He who spake as never yet man spake."

Happily, indeed, for human suffering, there is an antidote for every affliction, in the benign precepts of our holy religion. They teach us that—

> "Heaven gives us friends to bless the present scene; > Resumes them, to prepare us for the next."

To that only solace has the bereaved widow looked for strength and consolation, in the promised hope that "they who dwell in righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has received with deep sensibility the communication of the death of WILLIAM W. POTTER, a Representative of the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That, as a further testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, this House will adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The question was then put, and the resolutions were unanimously adopted; after which,

Mr. KEIM moved that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON requested Mr. KEIM to waive his motion for the adjournment, to enable him to make a motion for reconsidering a vote, which, unless it be done at that time, and entered on the journal, it would not be in his power to move at any other time.

Mr. KEIM acceded to said request.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the vote ordering the printing of the map of the seat of war in Florida, accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, be reconsidered.

The question on adjournment was then put, and carried in the affirmative; and

The House adjourned till to-morrow, 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SATURDAY, January 4, 1840.

Mr. EVANS asked leave of the House to introduce a bill, which he said was very important, and which would not take more than three minutes of the time of the House to consider. It was a bill which was usually reported by the Committee of Ways and Means; but, inasmuch as the organization of the House had been so long delayed, the committee had not yet had a meeting, and it was probable would not for several days. The money which had been appropriated for the contingent expenses of both Houses, and for the payment of the members, had been expended; and he learned from the officers of both Houses, that great inconvenience resulted from it. He wished to introduce the bill, if no objection was made, and would ask the House to go into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union to consider it.

No objection being made,

Mr. E. then introduced a bill making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government for the year 1840; which was twice read; when

Mr. E. then moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, which was agreed to; and

The House then went into committee, Mr. BANKS in the Chair, and the bill having been considered, was reported to the House; when it was read the third time by its title and passed.

On motion of Mr. TILLINGHAST, the House took up and considered the resolution of the Senate proposing the appointment of a Committee on the Library, and concurred in the same.

Mr. RAMSEY said he had had in his possession for several days a petition from the citizens of the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, complaining that their rights had been trampled on in permitting the gentleman here [Mr. NAYLOR] to take his seat as their representative, and asking that the frauds by which their rights have been violated be investigated; which he asked might be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order at that time.

Mr. RAMSEY then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to present the petition; and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 118, nays 67.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, W. O. Butler, S. H. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Goggin, Griffin, Hall, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, John Hill of N. C. Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Sergeant, Shaw, Shepard, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, John White, Wick, and Jared W. Williams—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Davies, G. Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Evans, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Habersham, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Lincoln, Marvin, Morgan, C. Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, C. H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—67.

So the rules were not suspended, it requiring a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. S. WILLIAMS asked leave to offer a resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the memorials and petitions presented to the House of Representatives at the last Congress, and upon which favorable reports were made, and on which the House did not finally act, and such memorials and petitions as were presented at the last Congress and referred, upon which the committees did not make reports, be again referred to the committees to which the said memorials and petitions were heretofore severally referred.

No objection being made, the resolution was received and agreed to.

The motion of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina to reconsider the vote on ordering the printing of the map of the seat of war in Florida, accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, came up for consideration; when

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina observed that the matter which he had moved to reconsider might be said to be a small matter; but inasmuch as abuses in small matters are the more dangerous as they are likely to escape attention, he had for this reason seized the earliest opportunity of bringing it before the House. The vote that he had moved the reconsideration of, was on the proposition to print 5,000 extra copies of the map of the seat of war in Florida, which the gentleman who moved the printing said would not cost more than 800 or 1000 dollars. This, to be sure, might be considered as a small matter in comparison with the ordinary expenses of the like nature. The House, in its expenditures for printing, was something like the law—de minimis non curat; but it was in regard to these small matters that economy was, as he had before observed, as necessary as in large ones; and as to this particular document, for all the use that it would be to the members of that body, it might as well be burnt. Any body was welcome to the share of them that would fall to him, for he could make no earthly use of them whatever. To his constituents they would not be worth a single baubee, and he could see no reason at all for printing, unless it was for the purpose of rewarding certain favorites of the Administration, hanging about Washington, with a portion of the public money. He did not know any one of the ten thousand instances of gross extravagance and waste of public money more to be denounced than that of members of Congress having printed for themselves, at the public expense, documents worth no more than mere waste paper, for the purpose of putting money in the pockets of a political partisan. He would mention one fact which would surprise many of the young members who were not yet aware of the extent to which the practice he adverted to had prevailed. While at home last summer, he received from one to two hundred maps of the United States—excellent maps, which would readily sell in a stationer's shop—that had been printed under the order of the House for the use of its members. These things were done under the plea of furnishing useful information to the members, to enable them the better to carry on the business of legislation; but they already had a valuable and extensive library; and if more information was necessary for the members, he thought it would be better to furnish them with good historical works, than to expend the public money in printing a parcel of maps, that would be worth to them, as far as useful information was concerned, no more than mere waste paper. He also received last summer a number of maps of Florida, which were, to him and his constituents, perfectly worthless. As he had been placed on the military committee, on the motion of whose chairman this printing had been ordered, he thought it his duty to move the reconsideration, being determined, while a member of that committee, to resist, to the utmost of his ability, every unnecessary expenditure, whether proposed in it or in the House.

In justice, however, to the gentleman who was at the head of that committee for the last Congress, he must say that that gentleman was uniformily in favor of preserving the strictest economy, and cordially co-operated with him in resisting every extravagance of expenditure.

Mr. T. concluded, by moving a reconsideration of the vote referred to in the commencement of his remarks.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said, that as he had submitted the motion for printing the map of Florida accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, it was due to himself and the House that he should explain the reasons which operated upon him in making that motion. The map of Florida accompanied the report of the Secretary of War, and the only question was, whether, in publishing the documents accompanying the President's message, the map should be included. There was a former order of this House, made some years ago upon his application, that a general order for printing should not include maps and charts, without the special order of the House. In consequence of this order, he brought the subject before the House, that the House might decide for itself, whether the map of Florida should constitute a part of each of the documents accompanying the message, and that he thought the gentleman from South Carolina had used an improper expression, when he spoke of them as extra copies.

Mr. J. said that he had seen the map of Florida, already published by the Senate, accompanying the report of the Secretary of War, and that he supposed the number of maps necessary to accompany the documents might now be procured at a moderate price, as the engraving had already been done under the orders of the Senate; and that he had inquired of one of the printers, then in the House, as to the probable cost for each, if now ordered. He was informed that each one would not exceed six or eight cents for the paper and printing, the engraving having been already done. For these reasons he had, in the first place, made the application to the House. Since that time, he had been informed that the Clerk of the House, some time before, had made a contract for the performance of such work by some lithographer in the city, whose name he did not recollect, by which the House was to pay about the same price that the Senate paid the engraver. He had inquired what the price of the work would be, but had not been able to learn. If he had supposed that a new engraving would have to be made, he should never have made the application.

Mr. J. said that he was gratified to learn from the honorable member from South Carolina, that he was so zealous an advocate for economy and reform—that the honorable member knew, having served many years in this House with him, that he, (Mr. J.) had been at all times the decided and warm advocate of ecomomy as well as the curtailment of all unnecessary expenditures, and he could assure the honorable member that he would not find him altered in that respect.

The honorable member had been pleased to say, that he had unlimited confidence in the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress, [Gen. McKAY,] but that he was apprehensive he would not have the same reason for a continuance of that confidence to the chairman of that committee in the present Congress; that this movement was a bad beginning.

Mr. J. expressed a hope that the honorable member from South Carolina would find no cause for dissatisfaction with the present chairman of that committee on the score of economy, and that he thought the motion submitted by him the other day for printing the map accompanying the report of the Secretary ought not to create any suspicion in his mind prejudicial to the present chairman of that committee. He begged to remind the honorable gentleman, that during the last Congress the Report of the Secretary of War was accompanied by a map of Florida, which was ordered by the House to be printed, upon the motion of the chairman of the Military Committee of that Congress, in whom the gentleman had so much confidence. He had not examined the journal, but had been so informed this morning by the chairman of that committee.

Mr. THOMPSON rose to state one fact. The contract for printing these maps, he said, was to be given to a person in this city, who was to be subjected to the same process of taxation that was proved to have been practised in New York, and other cities. That is (said Mr. T.) the person who does the work is to submit to an assessment on the price of the printing, which he is to contribute to the support of a publication, very important to the party in power—the Democratic Review.

Mr. BANKS observed that he should have pursued his usual course in silence, in reference to the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, but for one fact. It had been the course pursued by that gentleman, with many of the party who acted with him, to endeavor to produce an impression on the public mind, that there was a party in that House disposed to print public documents, merely to reward their political favorites. He knew not of such favorites; and knew of no such design in the part of those with whom he acted, and denied that he and his friends had ever been governed by any such motives. He readily believed, however, that the House did print too much, and he had never voted for the printing of a document, unless he deemed it necessary for the public service. With regard to the motion now under consideration, he should vote for it, believing that the printing of the document was unnecessary. But, said Mr. B. while the gentleman says so much about useless and unnecessary printing, let me call his attention, and that of the gentleman who vote with him, to the extravagant waste of public money last session in printing 20,000 extra copies of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to defalcations of public officers. The printing of these extra copies of old documents cost some $15,000 of the public money, and it was carried through the House by the votes of the gentleman and his friends.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina. The gentleman speaks at random, and states what is not true. I did not vote for the printing of these documents.

Mr. BANKS resumed. The document he referred to, was document 297, being the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the defalcations of public officers. I assert, said he, that there was a proposition to print 20,000 extra copies of these old documents, that it was carried through by the votes of the gentleman from South Carolina and his party, and that the journals will show it.

Mr. THOMPSON again interrupted Mr. BANKS, and said that the gentleman had stated at random what was not true.

Mr. BANKS continued. If the gentleman did not vote for that particular proposition, it certainly was carried through by the votes of the party with which he acts; and when the gentleman is endeavoring to create a false impression abroad that the friends of the Administration were seeking to expend the public money in useless printing, for the purpose of rewarding political favorites, it was but fair to bring up, as an offset to it, this extravagance of the last session, carried through by his party, as well as to deny the charge. With respect to the particular document under consideration, he felt it due to himself to say, that he should vote against the printing of it, not believing it to be necessary for the public information. As to the vote of the gentleman himself on printing the documents, he could not say with certainty how he voted, without a reference to the journal; though his impression had been that the gentleman had voted for it, until he denied it; but he did say that the printing was carried through by the votes of the gentleman's party.

Mr. WISE was sorry that his colleague had thought proper to make an attack on the motion made by him last session for the printing of the report relative to defalcation. I (said Mr. W.) made the motion to print the extra copies of document 297, which would show to the thousands of voters of this country, that the late message of the President was not true. The message stated that independently of the defalcation of Swartwout, only $60,000 were lost to the Government in consequence of the defalcations of public officers. That document, No. 297, would show that, by the land officers and collectors of the present Administration, nearly one million of dollars were lost, while the message stated the loss at only $60,000. This document disproved the truth of the President's message, and showed either that he was disposed to cover the defalcations of his officers, or that he was deceived by his Secretary of the Treasury. He would frankly say of Martin Van Buren, believing him to be a gentleman, that if he had read the document No. 297, he would not have made the statements he did in his message, in opposition to facts shown by the records within his reach. Permit me to say to my colleague, continued Mr. W. that the printing of that document was better calculated to promote public economy than any other; and that he would, at any time, be willing to pay ten dollars from out of the public Treasury, to show to the people how one dollar had been taken from it, either by fraud or in consequence of ignorance or mismanagement. Did the gentleman mean to say that there was not another motive besides economy that induced him and his party to vote against the publication of these documents? Sir, (said Mr. W.) if I could get the vote of the House to day, I would print the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in opposition to the message; and if I could get my colleague to circulate it in his district, his constituents would hold him accountable for voting as he did against publishing a document to circulate the truth. After some additional remarks from Mr. W.

Mr. BANKS said he hoped his colleague had not understood him as objecting to the original printing of document No. 297. It was important that it should be printed for the use of the members of the House, and he voted for it. But, said Mr. B. I objected, after it was printed, and in possession of every member of the House, to the printing of 20,000 extra copies, by which an expense of $15,000 was incurred. He did not deem it proper, at this time, to go into an examiurtion of the President's message, and he therefore would not reply to the remarks of his colleague on that subject; but he knew that an intelligent people had had full benefit of the document his colleague referred to—that it was widely circulated and discussed at public meetings, and that its statements were met and proved to be false in many particulars; for it was shown that many persons stated in it to be defaulters, had since paid up the balances against them, and that many were of necessity reported as such, from the mere fact that their accounts were unsettled. He had never voted against circulating useful or necessary information. He was as ready to give light to the people as any man; and whether by the viva voce principle, and against the secret system of voting, or by useful and necessary publications, he wished all his acts to be known to the people. He would have nothing concealed or misrepresented, but all his acts to be aboveboard. As to the question under consideration, it was perhaps a small matter, and nothing would have induced him to say one word in regard to it had it not been for the unceasing endeavors of some gentlemen on that floor to produce an impression on the public mind that the party with which he acted were disposed to expend money in useless printing for the purpose of rewarding political favorites. He had shown how the extravagance, charged by the gentleman from South Carolina, had been practised to a greater extent by the party with which he acted. How the change had come over gentlemen this session, which made them such great sticklers for economy, he would not pretend to say, but would only observe, in reference to himself, that he should vote against the printing of the document under consideration, as he did not believe it was wanted for the public service.

Mr. GRAVES rose to call the attention of the House to the probable cost of printing this document. When the chairman of the committee [Mr. C. JOHNSON] first moved the printing of this document, he stated that the main expense having already been incurred in the cost of engraving the plate, the printing would not amount to more than six or eight cents a copy. But (said Mr. G.) we are now told by the chairman that the old plates cannot be had, and therefore the engraving must be paid for anew. He would now ask the gentleman whether he did not believe the cost would be some four or five thousand dollars. He had risen to make these remarks in order to induce gentlemen to vote for the reconsideration moved by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said he understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BANKS] to charge on the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WADDY THOMPSON] and his friends, the passage of the resolution ordering the printing of 20,0000 extra copies of document No. 297. He understood that, in reply to that charge, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] said that the gentleman from Virginia had "at random stated that which was not true." Now (said Mr. S.) I hold in my hand the resolution authorizing the printing of 20,000 extra copies of document No. 297; I hold in my hand the yeas and nays (holding up the journal) on the adoption of that resolution; and among the yeas I find recorded the name of "WADDY THOMPSON, jun." I have nothing more (continued Mr. S.) to say on that subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to charge me with voting generally for extensive printing, and not to refer to this particular document.

Mr. BANKS. I stated expressly that it was document No. 297, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on defalcations of public officers. I referred particularly to the document, and stated so distinctly what it was, as to leave no room for misunderstanding.

Mr. THOMPSON said that he had not understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BANKS] as alluding to any particular document, but as making the general charge that he, Mr. T. had voted for extra printing ordered by the last Congress. This was what Mr. T. had pronounced untrue. Mr. T. certainly did not wish to be understood that he had not voted for printing an extra number of this particular document, for he did not hear the gentleman speak of any one in particular. He had voted in many instances for extra copies—in this, as in other cases, where the document was useful. But his general course had been to vote against such propositions. When he learned by the remarks of Mr. WISE that the gentleman [Mr. BANKS] had alluded to this particular document, he endeavored to get the floor before the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, and thus to set himself right.

While up, he would ask of the CLERK if the printing of this map was not given to the editor of a public print, who was not a lithographer?

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman that the CLERK's answer was, that the printing was given to Mr. Langtree.

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, sir, Mr. Langtree is the editor of the Democratic Review, and is not a lithographer; and one of the first acts of the CLERK was to give this printing to Mr. Langtree, who, as he was not a lithographer, must get the work done by somebody who is, and share the profits with him.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS asked who published the same map at the last session, and whether it was not published on the same plate this year that was used last session?

The SPEAKER said the CLERK did not know.

Mr. MORRIS wished merely to state the fact, that the impression had gone abroad that the Senate last year ordered a plate of this map to be engraved; and that subsequently, the House having ordered the printing of it, it was printed on the same plate; that this year the Senate had again ordered copies of it, which had been printed for that body; and that, therefore, if the printing now ordered by the House should be executed, there would be four different impressions from the same plate. Now, he would ask gentlemen better acquainted with such matters than he was, if this would not be paying four times for the same engraving.

Mr. COLES observed that it was true these maps had been printed several times; but the first maps printed were mere outlines, while the present was one very much improved and enlarged. He was opposed to the printing of an extra number of copies, as unnecessary, and therefore should vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. PECK called for the reading of the contract with Mr. Langtree, and it was read accordingly.

Mr. GRAVES inquired of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, if Mr. Langtree was a lithographer.

Mr. JOHNSON was understood to reply in the negative.

Mr. JOHNSON repeated, that he had no desire for the publication of the map, and should not have submitted the motion under any circumstances other than those named, and was glad that the question was now before the House, so that the members might decide whether the documents should be accompanied by the map or not.

Mr. CRARY wished to ascertain what was the practice of the House in ordering the printing of documents of a like nature. He understood, that at the last session these maps were ordered to be engraved by the Senate, and when the House ordered the same printing, they had to wait some two months, as it was said, for them to be re-engraved. As he understood the matter, when the Senate ordered maps to be engraved and printed, the expense was paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and when the House ordered the printing of the same maps they were again engraved, or supposed to be so, and paid for out of the fund of the House. Now, unless some plan was adopted by which the House kept its own plates, after paying for them, without suffering them to be used again and again at the same cost as if new engravings were made, he should in future vote against the printing of any maps whatever.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider; which was carried without a division.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution; when,

On motion of Mr. BANKS, it was laid on the table.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee asked permission of the House to introduce the following as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, he said, he wished to be printed for the information of the members, and to lie on the lable till he had an opportunity of calling it up:

Joint Resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the election of President:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, to wit:

"No person who shall hereafter be elected, and shall serve the period of four years as President of the United States, shall be again eligible to that office."

The SPEAKER said that it was not then in order to introduce the resolution without the consent of the House.

Mr. JAMESON said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to do what I intended on yesterday to have done, but failed in obtaining the floor before the House adjourned; that is, to announce to this House the death of the Hon. ALBERT GALLATIN HARRISON, one of the members elect from the State of Missouri, to the Twenty-sixth Congress. He died at his residence, near Fulton, Missouri, of bilious fever, in the month of September last. In his death, not only the bereaved widow and his children sustain a deep and abiding loss—the loss of an amiable, kind, and affectionate husband and parent—but Missouri lost one of her favorite and ablest sons. Always true to his trust, and faithful to the interests of Missouri, my lamented predecessor had obtained for himself a deep seat in the affections of her people. I have known the deceased since I have known myself, and many on this floor were also well acquainted with him; and they will bear me witness to the fact, that he posses ed all those noble qualities and virtues which of themselves constitute the high road to honor and distinction.

He had filled with credit to himself, and to the entire satisfaction of the people, more difficult offices of honor and profit, in the same length of time, than any man who has ever resided in Missouri. He was called by Him in whose hands life and death are held, from the theatre of action, in the meridian of life; and but few have passed from time, more to be lamented than ALBERT GALLATIN HARRISON; few, if any, can fill his place as the agent or Representative of Missouri; and a void is left in that domestic circle in which he moved, and in the heart of his amiable and intelligent bereaved widow, that no power on earth, no human being can fill: a void that can only be filled by the constant presence, aid, and protection of the Spirit of the Eternal God.

Mr. HARRISON was a native of Kentucky, from whose land so many able and chivalric men have emanated: the birth place of a great many members now on this floor from other States.

Mr. J. then offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That this House has received with deep sensibility the announciation of the death of the Hon. ALBERT G. HARRISON, one of the late Representatives elect from the State of Missouri for the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House tender the widow and relatives of the deceased their sympathy on this mournful event, and will testify their respect for his memory, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That, as a further evidence of their respect for the memory of the deceased, the House adjourn until Monday next, at 12 o'clock, m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, January 6, 1840.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of George Sayler, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Josias Sturgis and others, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill making appropriations for the removal of the raft in Red river, reported the same without amendment.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House had agreed to the joint resolution appointing a joint committee to superintend the appropriations for the library, and that they had, on their part, appointed Messrs. LEWIS, NAYLOR, and TILLINGHAST on that committee.

Also, that the House had passed a bill making partial appropriation for the expenditures of Government for the year 1840.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill to revive and continue in force an act entitled "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war.

A bill for the relief of John McCloud.

A bill for the relief David Waller.

A bill for the relief of Margaret Barnes, widow of Elijah Barnes.

A bill for the relief of Lemuel White.

A bill to authorize the payment of invalid pensions in certain cases.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred that part of the President's message relating to the finances of the country, and the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, reported a bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue.

Mr W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill more effectually to secure the public money in the hands of officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters, reported the same with amendments; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. said that he was directed by the committee to give notice that they would, on Monday next, ask for the consideration of these bills, in the order in which they were reported, and that they would feel it their duty to press their consideration after that date.

Mr. W. asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill just received from the House, making partial appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1840; which was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr MERRICK presented the memorial of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, praying for an extension of their charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. M. in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the heirs of Francis Newman; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill in relation to copy rights; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill for the relief of John S. Billings.

A bill for the relief of Joseph Bassett.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of William Easby, reported adversely to the same.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the report from the Secretary of the Navy, respecting the contingent fund of that Department, asked that the same might be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRUNDY gave notice that he would, on tomorrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill providing for the summary collection of the notes of the banks in the District of Columbia, under the denomination of twenty dollars, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

A bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill for the relief of Josephine Nourse; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill making partial appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1840, reported the same with amendments, which were read and concurred in; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. BENTON some days since, relative to the assumption, by the General Government, of the debts of the States, were then taken up, and after some remarks from Mr. BENTON, a portion of which will be found in this evening's paper,

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. GRUNDY thought that the question should be taken on each proposition separately, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. LUMPKIN expressed his concurrence in the object of the resolutions in some remarks which we will publish to-morrow, but would prefer that the resolutions might be permitted to lay on the table for the present; which was agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL offered the the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Louis Mitchell Rivard, of Wayne county, State of Michigan, in consequence of infirmities and disabilities contracted in the military service of his country.

Mr. NORVELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a steam cutter to be constructed for the revenue service on the Atlantic, another for that service in the Gulf of Mexico, and a third for the same service on Lake Erie and the Upper Lakes.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of enacting a law explanatory of the act of 8th May 1792, "to regulate the pay of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the militia of the United States," so as to provide that field officers, commanding volunteer regiments or battalions, shall be allowed the same compensation for the use and risk of horses furnished by themselves as is paid to company and staff officers in such command; and that such additional sum shall be paid to field officers who have served in Florida during the late troubles with the Seminole Indians.

A message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the employment of steam vessels in the revenue cutter service; and recommending the subject to the special and favorable consideration of Congress.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting returns of the condition of the several banks in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The following bills were taken up on their third reading, read a third time, and passed:

A bill for the relief of John H. Jacocks.

A bill to relinquish to the State of Mississippi the Two per cent. fund arising under her compact for admission into the Union.

A bill to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States, or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, January 6, 1840.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. W. B. CALHOUN of Massachusetts rose and submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House has heard with deep sensibility of the death of the Hon. C. ALVORD, a member elect of this House from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. CALHOUN said: I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, to give utterance to a labored eulogium upon the character of Mr. ALVORD. I rise simply to say that he was regularly elected a member of this Congress, and that he died several months anterior to the commencement of the present session. He was very young; and, had he been permitted to take his place amongst us, would undoubtedly have been the youngest member upon this floor. But, young as he was, he had acquired very prominent and enviable rank in the community where he resided Heaven had given him a high order of intellec; his mind was richly cultivated; his judgment was mature; and his general attainments extraordinary. In the study and pursuit of the law—the profession to which he had devoted himself—he was eminently distinguished; as he was, also, in both of the halls of legislation in his native State. Had he lived to take part in the proceedings of this body, he would, I am sure, have added largely to his fame and renown. He died, sir, in the midst of the warmest affections, and the fondest hopes of his friends, his associates, and of the community where his lot was cast.

Such, in brief, was JAMES C. ALVORD; and never, I am confident, has the House of Representatives been called upon to pay a tribute to the memory of one more worthy.

The question was taken on the resolutions, and they were unanimously adopted.

Mr. DUNCAN moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer a resolution, proposing to refer all the papers and testimony relating to the New Jersey disputed election to the Committee of Elections; and, on that motion, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN asked the gentleman to give way to enable him to make a motion, which was of immemorial usage, for the adjournment of the House as a testimonial of respect to the memory of the deceased.

Mr. DUNCAN immediately acceded to said request; when

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the House adjourn till to-morrow, which was agreed to; and

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 7, 1840.

Mr. LUMPKIN presented two letters from General Wool, sustaining the claim of George W. Paschall; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of Joseph Sawyer; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the petition and papers of William Eaton, now on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. RUGGLES, the several memorials on the subject of the regulation of steamboats, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying the establishment of a port of entry and a custom-house at some point on the Missouri river, and that a drawback be allowed to traders engaged in the commerce with Santa Fe; which, after some very interesting remarks of Mr. L. on the character and great importance of the trade to the country, its annual diminution, and the danger of its comple annihilation, if some measures were not speedily taken by Congress, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of the heirs of Christopher Tompkins; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the memorial of Enoch Baldwin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the papers on file in the case of Isaac Collier, were referred to the Committee on Commerce; and the papers of John Lang were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, ordered that the petition of E. W. and H. Smith, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims; and that the petition of Betsey Booth, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of a number of citizens of St. Mary's parish, La. praying a repeal of the present naturalization laws; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE presented a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the removal of the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of Charles A. Stewart; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred

A bill for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands, reported the same with amendments; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of William Jones, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of John S. Wilson, reported a bill for his relief.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the memorial of a number of settlers on the mineral lands in Illinois, praying to be allowed the right of preemption to said lands, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which, after some remarks by Messrs. LINN, WALKER and PRENTISS, was agreed to.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the General Assembly of Missouri, praying a grant of land for the establishment of a system of common schools; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill for creating a new land district in the State of Missouri, and for changing the boundaries of the southwestern and western land districts in said State.

A bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause the reserved lead mines belonging to the United States in the several States and Territories, to be sold as other public lands.

A bill for the relief of Isabella Hill, widow, and the children, of Samuel Hill, deceased.

A bill for the relief of Jane Waller.

Mr. NORVELL said he had been deputed by the Committee on the Public Lands to make the ungracious, and what might perhaps be considered the ungallant request, to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Amerigo Vespucci, which had been referred to it; which was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the following bills, reported the same without amendment:

A bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas.

A bill to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, range thirty-two west, in the State of Arkansas, to enter a section of land in lieu of the the sixteenth section in said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes.

A bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers in the late war to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof, and for other purposes.

A bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of a treaty between the United States and Choctaw Indians.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Joseph Paxton, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. GRUNDY, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. ROBINSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of J. M. Strader; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post office and Post Roads.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to allow drawback of duties on merchandise exported, via Missouri, to the provinces of Mexico, for the Indian trade, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FULTON, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the defence of the western borders of the States of Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the payment of damages to individuals who had suffered losses by Indian depredations, reported the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. NICHOLAS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring a bill to revive the act entitled an act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, approved May 26, 1834, and an act amending the same, and to extend the provisions of said acts to claimants to lands within the State of Louisiana; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. LINN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed respectfully to request annually of the Governors of the different States and Territories of the United States to furnish, for the use of the Congressional Library, all reports and documents in their possession in relation to the geology and mineralogy of their respective States and Territories;

And the resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. NORVELL, CLAY of Alabama, and PIERCE, were severally considered and agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Postmaster General to procure maps of the post offices and post roads, for the use of the Post Office Department.

Mr. YOUNG offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an additional appropriation of land, or of authorizing the issuing of land scrip, for the satisfaction of the outstanding military bounty land warrants, issued or to be issued under the authority of the United States to the soldiers of the late war with Great Britain or their legal representatives.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which was, by unanimous consent, considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the amount accrued of the two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within the limits of the State of Mississippi, reserved under the compact by Congress with said State upon her admission into the Union, for making a road or roads leading to said State; also, what amount, if any, of said Two per cent. fund, has been appropriated by Congress for said purpose, and whether said compact as to said fund still remains unfulfilled, and what grants of land, if any, have been made by Congress to the State of Mississippi for the purposes of internal improvement.

On motion by Mr. GRUNDY, the resolution submitted some days since by Mr. BENTON, relative to the assumption of State debts, was taken up.

Mr. G. then moved that it be referred to a select committee of seven, to be appointed by the CHAIR.

Mr. PRESTON, while he coincided with the sentiments of the resolution, and of the remarks of the Senator who introduced it, was averse to legislating prospectively and hypothetically; and after some further remarks, moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken on laying the resolution of Mr. BENTON on the table, and decided in the negative—ayes 15, noes 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bells, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, White of Indiana, and White of Tennessee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanann, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

Mr. BENTON said that he wished the usual practice of the body, which was to appoint the mover of resolutions a member of any committee raised to consider them, to be dispensed with on this occasion. He had offered these resolutions, and submitted his views on them to the Senate and to the country, and he now wished them to pass into other hands.

The question was then taken on Mr. GRUNDY's motion, which was agreed to, and the resolution was referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. GRUNDY, LUMPKIN, SMITH of Indiana, YOUNG, HUBBARD, ALLEN, and MERRICK.

Mr. LUMPKIN said that he had expressed yesterday, and reflection had confirmed it, a cordial concurrence in the doctrines contained in the resolution and the remarks of the Senator from Missouri; but as it was on his motion that it was laid on the table, he thought proper to say that it was from no idle motive that he had made the motion. He thought it would be desirable to present them in a more condensed form, and that that condensation would meet the views of the honorable mover of the resolution. He had therefore embodied in a single resolution, the substance of the first three propositions, which he asked might be read; which was done, as follows:

Resolved, That the assumption by the General Government of the debts of the States contracted for local purposes—whether it shall be a direct assumption, which would make the General Government responsible for said debts, or indirect, by a distribution of public money among the States, to enable them to pay their debts, or a pledge of public lands for the said purpose, or otherwise—would be impolitic and dangerous; unjust and unequal among the members of the Union, and wholly unauthorized by the letter or spirit of the Constitution.

He hoped this would be referred to the select committee, and be printed; which was agreed to.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the Secretary of State, in relation to the repeal of certain sanitary regulations by the French Government; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the purchase of an island at the confluence of the Mississippi and St. Peters rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida now overrun by hostile bands of Indians, being the special order of the day, was taken up, and Messrs. BENTON, TAPPAN, and PRESTON addressed the Senate on the provisions of the bill, when it was informally passed over.

The bill making appropropriations for the removal of the raft in Red river, was, on motion of Mr. KING, taken up, and after some remarks by him, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then went into Executive business; after which it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 7, 1840.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose and said: This House, Mr. SPEAKER, has a high constitutional duty to perform. One of the States of this Union, the State of New Jersey, which is entitled to six Representatives on this floor, has but one, the other five seats being, de facto, at this time vacant. Under these circumstances, it is our most solemn duty to determine who are entitled to these five seats. It is usual for gentlemen contesting seats here to bring their claims before the House by petition or memorial, showing the grounds on which such claims rest. But (said Mr. C.) we have waited from day to day, since the last decision of the House on this subject, without hearing from either of the parties who came here claiming to be Representatives from New Jersey; and it being the solemn duty of the House to come to some decision on the subject, he, as chairman of the Committee of Elections, had felt bound to bring the matter before them. Mr. C. therefore moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all papers or other testimony in possession of, or within the control of this House, in relation to the late election in New Jersey for Representatives in the Twenty-sixth Congress of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire and report who are entitled to occupy, as members of this House, the five contested seats from that State, and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be served on JOHN B. AYCRIGG, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL, WILLIAM HALSTED, CHARLES C. STRATTON, THOMAS JONES YORKE, PETER D. VROOM, PHILEMON DICKERSON, WILLIAM R. COOPER, DANIEL B. RYALL, and JOSEPH KILLE, all citizens of New Jersey, claiming to be Representatives from that State in this Congress, and that the service be made upon each gentleman personally, or by leaving a copy at his usual residence.

Mr. BELL said he had prepared some resolutions, which he wished to be read for the information of the House, that would probably supersede those proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. He understood that there were five gentlemen still in attendance here, who had been here from the commencement of the session, who claimed the right to sit and vote as members from the State of New Jersey. He was also informed that these gentlemen exercised the franking privilege, received their daily supply of stationery, and had marked seats in the hall with their names, as members of the House. Now, such gross irregularity as this was unparalleled in the practice of the House. These gentlemen had the right to be qualified and admitted, or to be informed that they could not be so; and it was the duty of the House to decide at once either that they were or were not members. Mr. B. said that the resolution which he was about to offer was a question of privilege, and he hoped the CHAIR would so decide it.

Mr. B. then sent the following resolutions to the CHAIR, which were read:

Resolved, That PHILEMON DICKERSON, PETER D. VROOM, WILLIAM R. COOPER, DAVID B. RYALL, and JOSEPH KILLE, who are in attendance, claiming to be admitted to sit and vote in this House, as Representatives from the State of New Jersey, are not and cannot be legally and constitutionally members of this body, until the regular returns, or certificates of election, granted to five other duly qualified persons by the Governor and Council of said State, in the exercise of the authority vested in them by the laws of said State, passed in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, shall have been set aside or adjudged void, upon due investigation had in the form and manner prescribed by the laws and usages of the House.

Resolved, That the House having decided that JOHN B. AYCRIGG, WILLIAM HALSTED, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS JONES YORKE, the persons having the regular and legal certificates of election, shall not be admitted to sit in this House and vote as other members, until it shall have established, by sufficient proof, that there was no fraud, mistake of the law, or other error, made or committed by the Governor and Council of New Jersey, in the returns or certificates of election granted as aforesaid; and said decision being contrary to the usual practice of the House in such cases, the SPEAKER be directed to notify the Governor and Council of New Jersey of the proceedings of the House in the premises, to the end that the people of the said State may be duly informed of the causes which have, for the present, deprived them of the services of five of the Representatives to which they are entitled by the laws and Constitution.

Resolved, That the returns, and all other papers or testimony in possession of the House relating to the five vacant seats in the New Jersey delegation, be referred to the Committee of Elections; and that the said committee proceed to examine the returns, and all other testimony which may be submitted to them, according to the rules and orders of the House; and that said committee first decide and report to the House who are entitled to sit and vote as members by the returns.

Mr. DUNCAN inquired whether these resolutions were in order. He offered one the other day, which was decided not to be in order, precisely similar in its terms to the first resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER said the resolutions of the gentleman were only read for the information of the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked if he understood the gentleman from Tennessee correctly, as saying that Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, KILLE, COOPER, and RYALL claimed their seats without a reference to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BELL understood that these gentlemen had marked their seats on the floor, were exercising the franking privilege, and received stationery from the Clerk, all of which privileges belonged only to members of the House. Mr. B. wanted to know whether they still claimed their rights as members, or whether they abandoned them. If they had abandoned their rights, they were liable to serious penalties for exercising the privileges they did.

Mr. RAMSEY said he should like to know whether this was a privileged motion or not; because the other day when he offered a petition from the citizens of the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, claiming their right to be represented here by the person they had elected, and asking an investigation into the frauds by which a person who was not lawfully a Representative [Mr. NAYLOR] had taken his seat here, it was decided that this petition could not be received without a suspension of the rules; and when the question was put on the motion to suspend them, the gentleman from Tennessee, who now raises this question of privilege, voted against the suspension.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was not, in his opinion, one of privilege. The only question of privilege arising out of this case, which would supersede the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, would be the coming forward of the five gentlemen named, and their claiming to be sworn. Were they to come forward and claim to be sworn, the SPEAKER would consider it a question of organization, and would feel it to be his duty to decide it previous to entertaining any other question. He could not, as the gentleman from Tennessee intimated, consider this as a privileged question on the information of a gentleman rising in his place; but the members claiming their seats must of themselves come forward and ask to be sworn, and then he would consider it a question overriding all others, and would decide upon it at once. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, in his opinion, could not supersede that of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RICE GARLAND appealed from the decision of the CHAIR. Assuming the position of the CHAIR to be correct, he would ask by what authority did the gentleman from South Carolina offer his resolution. If Mr. DICKERSON and his associates did not come forward and claim to be sworn, what right had the gentleman from South Carolina to move to send their case to the Committee of Elections. He understood the gentleman from N. York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] to state that these gentlemen did not now claim the right to take their seats.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked leave to explain what he did say. The members from New Jersey, Messrs. DICKERSON and others, were disposed to submit to the expressed will of the House, in the decision made in the case of their opponents. They regarded that decision as indicative of the determination of the House to permit neither set of the contesting claimants to take their seats until an investigation by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CAMPBELL said the gentleman from Louisiana asks by what authority I introduce this resolution. It is known to all that the State of New Jersey is entitled to six Representatives, and that she now has but one. The House has decided that one set of the claimants to the five vacant seats shall not be admitted; and since that decision they had waited from day to day without receiving any petition or memorial on the subject from either of the contending parties. He thought, therefore, it was the duty of the House to ascertain and decide who are entitled to take the vacant seats as members from New Jersey, and he also thought that the duty devolved on him, as chairman of the Committee of Elections, to submit the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND contended that the House had nothing to do with the matter until these five gentlemen come forward and demand to be sworn in as members. The House had decided that the other five should not be permitted to take their seats, and it had now nothing further to do but to inform the Executive of New Jersey that the five seats are vacant.

Mr. POPE agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina, and thought that his motion was a privileged one. He had prepared a set of resolutions himself, which he should have submitted this morning if he could have got an opportunity of doing so; and, in submitting it, he should have contended that it was a privileged motion. Indeed, he viewed it as a question of the highest privilege, and he hoped the SPEAKER would decide it to be so, and by this means bring the matter directly before the House. Mr. P. then submitted the resolution, which was read at his request for the information of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vt. said that the gentleman had predicated a privileged question upon mere rumor, and that no question of fact was before the House upon which to base such a motion; that the question could not arise, unless the claimants presented themselves to be qualified, which had not been done.

Mr. BRIGGS supposed that the question before the House was the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, and he desired that it might be read. [The resolution was read accordingly.] If the CHAIR did not decide the resolution to be a privileged motion, as he conceived it to be one of the highest order, he hoped it would be received with the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER said if no objection was made, the rule would be considered as suspended by general consent, and the resolution as before the House.

No objection being made,

Mr. ADAMS said he had no objection to the adoption of the resolution; but he would suggest to the SPEAKER and the House that there appeared to him to be a preliminary resolution which should first occupy the time of the House. That it should be made the duty of the SPEAKER to inform the Governor of New Jersey that his commission had been rejected by this House. It appeared to him that it was the first step that should be taken. Party principles and party interest, he said, had deprived a State of its representation; and it was due that the Executive Government of that sovereign State should be informed what had been done by this House, and why it had created a vacancy and had excluded five of its Representatives.

[Mr. HOFFMAN here was, by general consent, permitted to make a report from the Committee on the Rules, which was ordered to be printed, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

Mr. BANKS presented some documents on the same subject, which were also ordered to be printed]

Mr. FILLMORE desired to know of the chairman of the committee what evidence there was in possession of the House upon which the resolution was to operate. He had no recollection that any had been offered; and he did not understand that there was any mode by which evidence could be before the House but by its being presented to it. He wished, also, to know of the chairman whether he proposed to refer to the Committee of Elections the whole case, or the simple question as to who were entitled to be received in the first instance as sitting members. He wished to know if the gentleman proposed to keep the seats from New Jersey vacant until a decision should be made as to who were duly elected, or until the committee should report who were entitled to take the seats as sitting members under the returns.

Mr. CAMPBELL replied that the credentials of the Governor had already been presented to the House, and the House had decided that the gentleman presenting them should not take their seats. His expectations, therefore, were that the Committee of Elections would not only consider who were duly elected, but who were entitled to the returns.

Mr. FILLMORE said if that was the case, he would venture to assert that the five vacant seats of the members from New Jersey would remain vacant until the 1st of June next. He did not know whether the House had gone too far to recede; but he did hope that it was not yet beyond its power to correct the error into which it had fallen, and to decide that some persons must take seats as Representatives from New Jersey. He would prefer that this resolution should be so worded as to authorize the committee to inquire who had the documentary evidence of membership; and afterwards they should inquire if there was any evidence impeaching it. It seemed to him that this was but justice to New Jersey, who had too long been deprived of her full representation there, and that the House had not advanced too far to deprive itself of the power to do this act of justice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee said if gentlemen felt as he did with regard to the State of New Jersey being deprived of her representation, they would be satisfied that this matter ought long ago to have been referred to the Committee of Elections. He thought it was time the question was settled, and therefore he moved the previous question.

The CHAIR being about to put the question,

A discussion ensued involving the question whether the rules had been suspended by general consent, as suggested by Mr. BRIGGS, the CHAIR being under the impression that no objection was made when he stated that the rules would be considered as suspended unless objection were made, while Mr. GARLAND of Lou. Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. COST JOHNSON denied that they had consented—Mr. GARLAND stating that he had expressly objected; after which,

The SPEAKER said that, although he had been under the impression that no objection was made to the suspension of the rules, and had so stated the fact to the House, yet, upon the evidence of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] that he had objected, he would now put the question, "Shall the rules be suspended?"

Mr. BOTTS rose to ask the chairman of the committee to accept a modification of his resolution; the substance of which was, that the committee should first consider and decide on the returns of the Governor of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMPBELL replied, that he would with pleasure accept the modification suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, but for the reason that the House had already decided that question.

Mr. GRIFFIN having called for the yeas and nays,

The question was here taken, on the suspension of the rules, and carred—yeas 182, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Bond, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Clifford, Coles, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, Hall, Hammond, Hand, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Henry, John Hill of Virginia, John Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hoffman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Lawrence, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Medill, Montanya, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Sergeant, Shaw, Shepard, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Srong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Vanperpoel, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Worthington—182.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Bell, Anson Brown, Chinn, Chittenden, Mark A. Cooper, John W. Davis, Rice Garland, Gates, Giddings, Green, James, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Palen, Proffit, Rayner, Russell, Stanly, Storrs, Underwood, Thomas W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—23.

The question then coming up on the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL,

Mr BELL moved to amend it by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting his resolutions as a substitute.

Mr. RIVES rose for the purpose of objecting to any amendments to the resolution. He voted for the suspension of the rules, for the purpose of voting on the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, and not for the purpose of voting on amendments.

Mr. RANDOLPH here offered the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. BELL, to come in after the words "the Governor and Council of New Jersey;" and Mr. BELL accepted it as a modification of his motion:

"That the commissions issued by him, according to the laws of said State, to JOHN B. AYCRIGG, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL, WILLIAM HALSTED, CHARLES C. STRATTON, and THOMAS JONES YORKE, have not been deemed sufficient by the House to authorize them holding the same to be sworn in as members of this House."

Mr. BELL then addressed the House at length in support of his resolutions, going into the general merits of the whole question with regard to the New Jersey election.

Mr. DUNCAN followed in reply, in the course of which he brought out much valuable testimony in elucidation of the subject; but, before concluding, Mr. D. yielded the floor to

Mr. VANDERPOEL, who moved that the House adjourn; but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. JONES of Va. who moved to refer the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the finances, which was lying on the table, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WISE said, with the understanding that this reference was not to interfere with the reference of the President's message, he had no objection.

The SPEAKER said, that the reference could only be done by the general consent of the House.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON objected.

Mr. JONES then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to make the reference; and upon that question the yeas and nays having been called for,

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew his objection, and the question of reference was put and carried.

Mr. JONES moved an adjournment; which motion was lost.

Mr. WISE moved to take up the bill making appropriations in part for the support of Government, which had been returned from the Senate with several amendments; which motion was agreed

Mr. EVANS said that the amendments of the Senate to the bill made it necessary to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider said amendments, and accordingly made that motion; which was agreed to.

The House then went into committee on said bill, Mr. BANKS in the chair.

Mr. EVANS explained that the amendment of the Senate did not involve any additional appropriation—it only specified that $50,000 of the sum appropriated was for lithography and printing executed for the last Congress.

Mr. WISE asked if the amendment of the Senate appropriating $50,000 was for arrearages or for money already expended; because if it were prospective, he should vote against it.

Mr. EVANS said it was for money expended in lithography and printing ordered at the last session of Congress, which the contingent fund was insufficient to meet.

The amendments having been agreed to, the committee then rose and reported the bill to the House; and

The House then concurred in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. EVANS said before this bill could be finally passed into a law it was necessary to appoint the usual joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, and with that view he moved to take up the joint resolution of the Senate for the appointment of said committee; which motion was agreed to, and the resolution was concurred in.

Mr. CROCKETT gave notice that on to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "an act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and to perfect titles to lands therein described, and to settle the claims to vacant and unappropriated lands within the same."

On motion of Mr. DUNCAN,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement showing the contingent expenses of the military establishment during the year 1839; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to the resolution of the Senate of the 27th December, in relation to permitting certain officers of the army to retire upon half pay; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General, showing the contingent expenses of that Department for the year 1839; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR presented a memorial from Samuel Norris, praying that his right to certain lands may not be invalidated by the treaty with the Caddo Indians; which, on motion by Mr. MOUTON, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The CHAIR presented the memorial of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Iowa, praying a donation of land for the purposes of education; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial from the same body, praying the establishment of certain post routes; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial of the same body, praying a settlement of the contested boundary line between said Territory and the State of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented a petition of Joshua Howard, of the county of Wayne, State of Michigan, praying for the passage of an act confirming to him his claim to a tract of land south of the river Rouge, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Milwaukie, Wisconsin, praying an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, it was ordered that the petition of William Dickinson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, it was ordered that the memorial of Joseph Roby, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; and that the memorial of Joseph Radcliff, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the petition of Zadock Smith, praying remuneration for extra work done by him on the Cumberland Road; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana, presented the memorial of the inhabitants of the county of Milwaukie, Territory of Wisconsin, praying the confirmation of the titles of Francis Laventure and others to certain lands in said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, it was ordered that the petition of Noah Miller, on file, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. RUGGLES, it was ordered that the memorials of William A. Whitehead; the petition of Thomas Jefferson Smith; the petition of a number of citizens of New York; and other papers in relation to the establishment of a port of entry at Indian Key, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of W. W. Moulton and two hundred and seventy-three other citizens of Ohio, praying for a reduction of the postage on letters, so that none should exceed ten cents; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LINN submitted additional documents in the case of Albin Mitchell in behalf of the heirs of Madam De Lusser; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the petition of the heirs of James Simpson, praying confirmation of title to a tract of land, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred a petition of the owners of the ship Alleghany, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of the heirs of Francis Newman, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred

A bill respecting the heirs of Agnes Dundas;

A bill for the relief of the assignees of Louis Baron De Ferrier; and

A bill to amend the act entitled, "An act to amend the several acts respecting copyright;

Reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred a bill to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie Canal, which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred a bill to amend "an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, approved the second day of March, 1807," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred

A bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket; and

A bill for the relief of J. M. Strader;

Reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred a bill for the relief of Avery, Saltmarsh and Company, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson;

A bill for the relief of John Richey;

A bill for the relief of Jacob Hanks;

A bill for the relief of David McNair;

A bill for the relief of James H. Ralston;

A bill for the relief of Alfred Westfal;

A bill for the relief of Dennis Quinlivan;

A bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd;

A bill for the relief of John L. Scott; and

A bill for the relief of William Bennett;

which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. YOUNG and NORVELL were severally considered and agreed to:

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution; which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at Mississisippi city, in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following motions for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing and requiring the Registers and Receivers of the United States land offices, in their offices, and within their districts, respectively to administer oaths in all cases where, by law, or the rules of the Treasury or Land Office Department, affidavits or oaths are required to be made previous to the purchase or entry of any tract of land, without any fee or extra compensation for such service.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing ports of entry and delivery, or ports of delivery, at the cities of Chicago, Alton, and Cairo, in the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a hospital for the accommodation of sick and disabled boatmen and indigent passengers, navigating the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, at the city of Cairo, in the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making specific appropriations for the improvement of the Rock river and Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river, so as to make said river navigable for steamboats at all seasons of the year when the navigation is not obstructed by ice.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a marine hospital for the accommodation of sick and disabled boatmen and passengers on the Ohio river, at Evansville, in the State of Indiana; and that the papers and documents relating to the same, submitted to the Senate at the last session, together with all other papers relative to the establishment of marine hospitals on the Western waters, be referred to said committee.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill making appropriations for the removal of the raft in Red river, came up on its third reading; and, after some remarks from Messrs. CRITTENDEN, SEVIER, PIERCE, MOUTON, KING, and DAVIS, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida overrun by hostile bands of Indians was taken up, and

Mr. CLAY of Alabama addressed the Senate at length in reply to the remarks of Mr. PRESTON, and in favor of the bill.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay, after some remarks by Mr. HUBBARD;

The bill for the relief of W. N. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and S. W. Simonton; and

The bill for the relief of W. A. Whitehead, late collector of the port of Key West, in Florida, after some remarks in their favor by Mr. WRIGHT;

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy; and

The bill for the relief of Richard T. Banks, after some remarks in their favor by Mr. WHITE of Tennessee; and were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The joint resolution authorizing the President to cause certain surveys to be made;

The bill to remit such duties, and to cancel such bonds, as have been required of persons engaged in the whale fishery, and to restrain all future exactions of duties of such vessels and their cargoes, was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. DAVIS and WRIGHT, was informally passed over.

The Senate then went into Executive business; after which it

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1840.

Mr. BRIGGS said it was stated on the journal of yesterday, that after the suspension of the rules, on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to introduce his resolutions referring the testimony relative to the New Jersey contest to the Committee of Elections, he subsequently moved to modify the same, to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] is made to object. It is a mistake of the CLERK in making up the journal. Certainly every gentleman has the right to modify his own resolution. Mr. B. moved to strike out that part of the journal.

Mr. RIVES said he found he was misunderstood in making the objection, and hoped he would be excused by the House in making an explanation. He was of the opinion that the gentleman from South Carolina had not the right to amend his resolution in any one respect whatever. He is reported as having objected to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. It was not the fact. He objected to the modification of the gentleman from South Carolina, because the rules had been suspended for a particular resolution. Mr. R. moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as follows:

"After the suspension of the rule, Mr. CAMPBELL proposed to modify his resolution so as to enlarge the powers of the committee. To this motion Mr. RIVES objected as being out of order, the rules having been suspended for a particular object, embraced in the words of the resolution. Action had taken place relative to the resolution as soon as the SPEAKER declared the rules suspended for its reception; and that it could not then be altered, except by general consent, or by vote of the House; for the mover of the resolution had no more control over it, at that particular stage of the proceeding, than any other member who had voted with a view to its adoption."

The CHAIR stated that the question on the amendment to the amendment would be first taken.

Mr. BRIGGS said he had made the suggestion to amend the journal because he thought it did not state the facts; and that the motion to spread on the journal the declaration of members was irregular and unusual. He was understood to be opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIR again stated the question.

Mr. RIVES said he had refrained from taking up any of the time of the House, and did not wish to do so now; he merely wanted to place himself right on that subject, and had presented the amendment for that purpose. To save time and discussion, however, he would withdraw his amendment, and consent to that of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was then taken on Mr. BRIGGS's amendment, and carried.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania submitted a resolution, which was read as follows, for the information of the House:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to this House the late arrangement made for the transportation of the mail between Philadelphia and Washington city; over what route the same is carried; whether the distance by said route is greater or less than under the former arrangement; whether the time required for its transportation, between the said places, has been increased or diminished by the change; whether the communication between New York and Boston, and the South and Southwest, has been facilitated or retarded thereby, and whether the price paid for the transportation of the same has been increased or diminished, and what is the amount of the difference.

And whereas it is alleged, to the great discredit of the Government, that the Eastern mail has been clandestinely and fraudulently transmitted by the agents of the Post Office Department, from Philadelphia to Baltimore, by the cars of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, notwithstanding the Postmaster General has discontinued his contract with the said company for carrying the said mail: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be required to communicate to this House whether it is true, as alleged, that such fraud has been committed upon the said company by any officer or agent, person or persons, connected with, or in the employment of, the Post Office Department; and if so, whether such officer or agent, person or persons, have been removed or discharged; and that a full statement of the facts relating to the transaction be communicated to this House.

Objection being made to the reception of the resolution at this time,

Mr. C. moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer it; but before the question was put,

Mr. DUNCAN asked if the resolution was in order, or could be moved, when another member was entitled to the floor, upon another subject.

The CHAIR understood the gentleman to have yielded the floor for the purpose; to which

Mr. DUNCAN, however, dissented and claimed the floor.

The resolutions of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, to refer all the testimony in relation to the New Jersey disputants to the Committee of Elections, and Mr. BELL's substitute for said resolutions, declaring that the Democratic claimants have not the right to be sworn, &c. being the question before the House,

Mr. DUNCAN, who was entitled to the floor upon said question, concluded his very able speech in review of the whole subject. He adduced many facts, including statements of the polls, and the message of the Governor of New Jersey, in proof of the fraud which had been committed to deprive the people of that State of their legitimate representation, and in justification of the course the House of Representatives had pursued in setting aside the claimants who hold the certificates. [His remarks will be published at length hereafter.]

Mr. BOTTS having obtained the floor, at the solicitation of several members, moved that the House adjourn; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee, to enable him to make a motion to refer so much of the report of the Secretary of War as relates to Military Affairs to the committee on that subject; and subsequently to Mr. SERGEANT, to make a motion to refer certain Senate bills, on the SPEAKER's table, to appropriate committees; but both motions having elicited debate, and objection having been made to said references, before the same was disposed of,

Mr. BOTTS renewed his motion for adjournment; which was put, and carried, and

The House adjourned till to-morrow, 12 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 9, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States, communicating additional information in relation to the disputed boundary line between the State of Missouri and Territory of Iowa; which, on motion by Mr. LINN, with all the other papers on the subject, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a message from the President of the United States, showing the operations of the Topographical Bureau, during the year 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ult. calling for information in relation to the recent suspension of the banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of Samuel J. Smith for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the petition of John P. Converse and Henry J. Rees was taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PHELPS presented the petition of Samuel Dean; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial of Samuel Raub, jr. in relation to his safety valve for steamboat boilers; which, with a former petition on the same subject, and the certificates of a number of captains of steamboats, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented two petitions—one from a number of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, and the other from citizens of Bridgeport, Connecticut, all of whom are engaged in the coach-lace making business. They say that the duty on worsted coach lace is sufficient to enable them to manufacture it cheaper than it can be imported; but that silk lace, by a recent judicial decision, is permitted to be imported duty free, contrary, as they say, to the spirit of the law. They therefore pray a modification of the law. The petitions were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a petition from the vestry of St. Philip's Church of the city of Charleston, praying a remission of duty on an organ, imported for the use of said church; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of a number of American citizens residing in Malaga, in the Kingdom of Spain, representing that American citizens are not permitted the rite of sepulture in the places for burial there, but are compelled to be carried to the shore of the Mediterranean, where they are suffered to remain. They pray that Congress may make an appropriation which will enable them to procure a place of burial for their dead. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from John S. Roulett; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial from the president and directors of the Patriotic Bank of Washington, praying for a renewal of their charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of Mary Prettyman, widow of Thomas G. Prettyman; which was referred to the same committee.

Also, the petition of William Hebb, the keeper of the naval magazine in the city of Washington, asking an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the several memorials now on the files of the Senate, praying for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Little Egg harbor, were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. RUGGLES, the petition and papers on file in the case of Joseph Veazey, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana presented a memorial of citizens of Kosciusko county, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route therein designated; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of the superior of the religious order of the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, a charitable institution for the education of indigent children in St. Louis, praying for the remission of duties on certain presents imported from France; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of James Thompson, agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and

The memorial of William Strickland and others, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the message of the President relative to the transfer of appropriations in the War Department, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill supplementary to the act entitled, "An act to establish branches of the Mint of the United States, approved March 3, 1835," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of certain manufacturers of wool, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it lie on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. also from the same committee, to which had been referred the message of the President in relation to the transfer of appropriations in the Treasury, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Peter Warner; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry J. Pickering; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Samuel H. Thompson, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the memorial of Andrew Armstrong, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing imprisonment in all cases under and by virtue of mesne process issuing out of the courts of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of the obstructions in the navigation of the Sound, or Kill, Van Kull, and in the Raritan or Prince's Bay, between the port of Perth Amboy, in the State of New Jersey, and port of New York, in the State of New York, mentioned in the report of Captains Lawrence Kearney, John D. Sloat, and M. C. Perry, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated December 9, 1837.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to the Senate whether Rock Island, in the county of Rock Island and State of Illinois, has been abandoned as a military post by the troops of the United States, and whether the further reservation of the same is necessary for the defence of the Western frontier.

The various resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. YOUNG and SMITH of Indiana, were severally considered and agreed to.

The resolution submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Easby, adverse to that petition, was considered and agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The following bills were taken up on their third reading, read a third time, and finally passed, viz:

The bill for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gay.

The bill for the relief of W. N. Robertson, Samuel H. Garrow, and S. W. Simonton.

The bill for the relief of W. A. Whitehead, late collector of the port of Key West, in Florida.

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Murphy.

The bill for the relief of Richard T. Banks.

The joint resolution authorizing the President to cause certain surveys to be made.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida now overrun by hostile bands of marauding Indians, was taken up on its third reading, and Messrs. CRITTENDEN, PIERCE, and PRESTON addressed the Senate at length on the subject.

Mr. STRANGE intimating his intention to speak on the bill, on motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 9, 1840.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of John H. Jacobs was twice read; and, on the motion of Mr. CURTIS, referred to the Committee of Commerce.

Also, Senate bill making appropriation to complete the removal of raft of Red River, and for other purposes, was twice read.

Mr. CURTIS moved that it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to refer it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr McKAY moved to refer it to the Committee of WAYS and Means; and

After some discussion as to the appropriate committee to which the same should be referred, in which Messrs. CURTIS, VANDERPOOL, McKAY, CROSS, BIDDLE, GARLAND of Louisiana, POPE, EVERETT, and MITCHELL partook,

Mr. PECK moved that the bill do lie on the table; upon which motion

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion, by count, that the same do lie on the table, and decided in the negative—ayes 54, nays 77.

After some further remarks by Messrs. EVANS, SERGEANT, and R. GARLAND,

Mr. SERGEANT moved to postpone the subject until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE obtained the general consent of the House to present the memorial of R. B. Forbes and others, American citizens, and merchants in Canton, China, for a naval force to protect their persons and the property of themselves and their countrymen; and also to send an agent, who shall be authorized to make a commercial treaty with that empire; which memorial, on motion of Mr. L. was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOFFMAN having called for the special order of the day, which was the amendment to the rules reported by the committee on that subject,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that said special order be postponed until Tuesday next, and that the rules of the last Congress be further adopted for the government of the House until Thursday next; which motion was agreed to.

The CHAIR announced that the subject matter before the House was the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, proposing to refer all the documents and testimony in relation to the New Jersey disputed election to the committee on that subject; and Mr. BELL's substitute therefor, declaring that the gentlemen without certificates should not be qualified.

Mr. BOTTS, who was entitled to the floor, said if he were to consult his inclination instead of what he believed to be his duty, he would continue, as heretofore he had been, a silent member; but believing, in the sincerity of his heart, that the decision made here was fraught with more momentous and important consequences than any one presented to an American Congress since the adoption of the Constitution, he should feel faithless to the high trust imposed in him if he permitted the present occasion to pass without expressing his unqualified and unmitigated disapprobation of the course pursued by the majority of the House. He did not belong to that class of politicians denominated the State Rights party, according to the modern definition of that term; for he believed that the general understanding of the definition by the world was, that they profess every thing and practise nothing; nor was he one of those who attached much importance to a name. It would afford him very little satisfaction, when he and his children were deprived of their liberties, to be told that they were taken from them by the friends of the human race. For three weeks of this session, he had sat in the House a silent member, but confessed that he was a pained and mortified spectator of the scenes around him—scenes that he had been but little accustomed to elsewhere. It was but a few years ago that the first act of expunging took place in any legislative body of this country; it was an act, the only object of which was to render homage to a lawless and vindictive tyrant—the only effect of which was to produce heartfelt and sincere disgust in the bosom of every honest patriot. It was his misfortune to have been the spectator of the second scene of expunging. The first was all a farce, but the second might be called a tragedy—and might well be called the last days of the Republic. He had seen the State of New Jersey expunged, not by the miserable and farcical process of drawing black lines, but had seen her representatives driven from this floor; and for what purpose—for the purpose of affecting party triumph. He said it had pleased the people of the United States to elect representatives to this House in opposition to the party in power; but that party, in order to effect their objects in the election of Speaker, found it necessary to expunge five of the representatives of New Jersey from that floor, and he questioned very much, if it had not been for the existing state of parties which divided the body, whether these gentlemen would have been deprived of their seats.

Mr. B. then entered at large into the whole merits of the case, contending that the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, as prima facie evidence of the election, entitled those holding them to take their seats. He denied that a particle of testimony had been offered to impeach those certificates; for he would not admit the certificate of the Secretary of State to be evidence, or that that officer had a right to affix the seal of the State to it. Mr. B. referred to various precedents to show that the person having the returns in all legislative bodies, always takes the seat in the first instance; and in the course of his remarks, referred to a speech of Mr. SMITH of Maine, in the Legislature of that State, which he said was in opposition to the course now pursued by that gentleman. At the opening of the session of the Legislature of Maine, to which Mr. B. referred, a motion, he said was made by Mr. ALBERT SMITH, now a member of this House, to admit Mr. Andrew Roberts to his seat, on the ground that he held the certificate of the returning officer, though Mr. Roberts did not not receive a majority of the votes.

Mr. SMITH asked leave to explain. Mr. Roberts, he said, did receive a majority of the votes of the people of the town of Kennebunk. There never was any question raised to the contrary. The only question was, whether the voters of the town of Kennebunk had, under the laws of the State, a right to adjourn the polls from day to day. It was admitted on all hands that Mr. Roberts had an undisputed majority. The gentleman, Mr. S. said, don't catch me going against majorities.

Mr. BOTTS continued, and read various extracts from the speech of Mr. SMITH referred to. Mr. B. then referred to the precedents of this House, which, he said, all bore him out in the ground he had taken; and in the Legislatures of the different States, he said, it was invariably the practice to give the seats to the persons holding the certificates of the returning officer. In elucidation of this part of his argument, Mr. B. referred to a case of contested election in the Virginia Legislature, in which Messrs. Berkley and Davis both claimed to be elected to represent the county of Hanover. This case, Mr. B. said, was misunderstood, and erroneously stated the other day by his colleague, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] and he then proceeded to state the case according to his understanding of it, which was, that the seat was awarded to the gentleman who held the certificate of the sheriff. Mr. B. appealed to his colleague, [Mr. BANKS,] who had presided with so much ability for twenty years in the Virginia Legislature, if, in cases of contested election, there ever was an instance in which the seat was not given, in the first instance, to the person who had the prima facie evidence.

Mr. BANKS said, that as he had been appealed to, he would state what had usually been the practice in the House of Delegates of the State of Virginia. He knew that the usual practice had been that the certificate of the sheriff should be received as prima facie evidence of election; and the party holding it qualified, when there was no illegality in conducting the polls, in which case it was sent back. He thought, however, his colleague was mistaken in his statement of the case from the county of Hanover. He held in his hand a statement of the facts in this case, made by the Clerk of the House of Delegates, from which it appeared that Mr. Berkley came into the House of Delegates, and claimed and took his seat as a delegate from the county of Hanover. Mr. Davis, his opponent, also came into the House and took his seat, both members having qualified before the Executive, as the members of the Virginia Legislature are qualified by that officer, and not, as here, by the Speaker. In this state of the case, and without any petition or memorial whatever from any quarter on the subject, a resolution was introduced by Mr. Winston to refer the whole matter to the Committee of Privileges and Elections. Mr. B. here read the following extract from the statement in his hand: "On the second day of the session, a motion was made by Mr. Winston to adopt the following resolution: Resolved, That the Committee of Privileges and Elections be instructed to report upon the contested election from the county of Hanover as soon as possible; and in the mean time, that the two members thus contesting their elections from said county, be not entitled to their seats in this House.

"It is here proper to state [the Clerk adds] that no petition had been presented by any person previously to raise the question."

Mr. B. said it was after the committee had reported that Mr. Berkley was admitted to his seat, and that he held it for the remainder of the session.

Mr. BOTTS asked which of the two had the returns.

Mr. BANKS replied that one held the certificate of the sheriff, the other that of the deputy sheriff.

Mr. BOTTS said it was because the polls were held by both those officers; in the first part of the day by the sheriff, and in the latter part by the deputy, that the difficulty occurred in the House of Delegates, and caused them to take the course they did. He would ask his colleague, however, if he himself had not, in private conversation, expressed to him the opinion that the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey were sufficient to enable the gentlemen holding them to take their seats. He was surprised, he said, after hearing these admissions from his colleague, to see him, time after time, passing through the tellers and voting to exclude these gentlemen.

Mr. BANKS here asked leave to explain, which being granted,

Mr. B. said as he did not mean to discuss this question, believing the whole discussion to be premature, his object had been, and was still, to refer the whole matter to the Committee of Elections, who would embody all the evidence and facts in a report, and the House could then, and not before, decide who were the legal and constitutional representatives from the State of New Jersey. Mr. B. admitted that he had said here and elsewhere that the certificate of return was prima facie evidence, but not conclusive of right; but in this case, which stands without an exact parallel, ten gentlemen claim seats, when only five are entitled. The House was then forced to take some action on the subject, and they adopted the safest course in securing the rights of the citizens of New Jersey, in referring the whole matter to a committee, where all the facts may be elicited, and the House be enabled to give a correct judgment upon the rights of the parties respectively.

Mr. POTTS continued his remarks for some time, replying to the remarks of Mr. DUNCAN, and other gentleman, who had previously occupied the floor in opposition to the claims of the members commissioned by the Governor. After he had concluded,

Mr. RANDOLPH obtained the floor, and discussed at some length the merits of the New Jersey question. He went over the same ground which had been previously occupied by himself and other members on the same side of the controversy. He presented many documents in the course of his remarks, to prove that frauds had been committed at the ballot box—sufficient, he contended, to establish the right of those holding the certificates of the Governor to be accredited by the House as the legitimate representatives of the people of New Jersey. Mr. R. without having finished his remarks, yielded the floor to

Mr. CORWIN, who moved that the House do adjourn; upon which motion,

Mr. SMITH of Maine demanded the yeas and nays; and the same having been ordered,

Mr. CORWIN withdrew his motion for adjournment; whereupon,

Mr. STANLY renewed it.

Mr. RAMSEY demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 64, nays 104.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RANDOLPH having proceeded in his remarks a short time, again yielded the floor to

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS, who moved that the House do adjourn.

Mr. RAMSEY demanded the yeas and nays on said motion; which having been ordered,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS withdrew his motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH renewed the motion for the adjournment, upon which

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 58, nays 78.

So the House again refused to adjourn.

Mr. RANDOLPH then sent to the Chair a mass of depositions, touching the illegality of votes taken in the districts rejected by the county clerks; and the Clerk having proceeded for some time in the reading of the same,

Mr. C. WILLIAMS moved that the House do adjourn; upon which motion,

Mr McCLELLAN demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered by the House, were—yeas 67, nays 58.

The House accordingly adjourned till to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 10, 1840.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, exhibiting the number, names, and compensations of the clerks in that Department during the year 1840; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, exhibiting the prices of certain State stocks in the London and home markets, which was ordered to be printed, and that fifteen hundred additional copies be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ult. calling for information in relation to the proceedings in the case of Lieut. Col. Brant; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The CHAIR also presented the memorial of Chauncey Hall, praying that provision may be made by Congress for testing the merits of a steam engine, of which he is the inventor; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, it was ordered that Duncan L. Clinch have leave to withdraw his petition and papers, presented at the last session.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of John Bauer, a soldier in the Ordnance Department, praying a pension, in consideration of a disability incurred by the premature discharge of a cannon, whilst assisting at the firing of a national salute; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. P. also presented the petition of Wilfred Knott, a soldier during the late war with Great Britain, praying a pension for wounds received whilst in the discharge of his duty; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. ROANE, ordered that the petition of Stephen McCormick, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial of Samuel Lord, praying to be released from liability as surety on a custom-house bond; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, it was ordered that the petition of James H. Clark, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the memorial of Joseph K. Boyd and others, surviving captors and legal representatives of deceased captors, who volunteered in recapturing and destroying the frigate Philadelphia, in the harbor of Tripoli, in the year 1804, praying remuneration for the services performed in that action; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a letter of W. W. CHAPMAN, Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Iowa, in reference to a report in a morning paper of some remarks made by Mr. L. in the Senate yesterday, on the disputed boundary between Iowa and Missouri, and which were as follows:

MISSOURI AND IOWA TERRITORY.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial from the Legislative Council of Iowa, praying a settlement of the contested boundary line between said Territory and the State of Missouri.

Mr. LINN said that, in consequence of the delay on the part of the Congress of the United States definitely to settle, in conjunction with the authorities of Missouri, the northern boundary of the State, a serious conflict seemed at one time to be threatened between us and our brethren of the Territory of Iowa. Fortunately, the storm had for the present passed without bloodshed, but we are admonished of the necessity of settling permanently this disturbing matter.

He thought the State of Missouri had not been well treated by the General Government. She had presented to the Senate, nearly ten years since, a memorial on the necessity of defining our limits on the north; and it was predicted in that paper that grave evils would occur if delayed until the country north of us should become settled by the whites, or given to emigrating tribes of Indians. Congress neglected these admonitions, and for several years a bill, introduced by himself, having for its object the settlement of the question, was, for want of time, not passed by the House of Representatives. The State of Missouri passed an act appointing commissioners to run her Northern boundary, and invited the General Government to unite commissioners with hers, to aid in settling this important question. This invitation was not accepted. Missouri proceeded to run her line according, as is believed, to the act of Congress of March, 1820, and the Constitution of the State.

Subsequently to this, Congress passed an act appointing Commissioners to run the southern boundary of Iowa, who made a report, which was laid before Congress during the last session. One object Mr. LINN had in view in rising, was to convince the Senate that the claim of Missouri to an extension of her jurisdiction was not a claim of yesterday, but that she informed Congress of the difficulties which surrounded the subject, nearly ten years since. Mr. LINN then read as follows from the memorial:

"Your memorialists further represent that the northern boundary of this State, as indicated by the act of Congress of the 6th of March, 1820, and adopted by our Constitution, is the parallel of latitude which passes through the rapids of the river Des Moines, extending on that line from the northwest corner of the State 'to the middle of the channel of the main fork of the said river Des Moines; thence, down along the middle of the main channel of the said river Des Moines to the mouth of the same where it empties into the Mississippi river.' This line is vague and indefinite. The country on the Des Moines is still unsettled, and comparatively unknown, although the flood of migration now pouring into this State is rapidly tending to that border. We are not informed of the exact local position of the 'rapids of the river Des Moines,' nor whether those rapids are occasioned by a single obstruction of the stream, so as to indicate the precise position of the line, or are produced by a succession of shoals, extending like the rapids of the Mississippi, for many miles. And if, on examination, it should be found that the course of the Des Moines, like that of the Mississippi, is disturbed by different rapids, with long intervals of a smooth current between them, it may well be doubted which of the rapids shall indicate our northern boundary. And we consider it highly important that the line in question should be definitely settled and distinctly known before the white settlements, now rapidly spreading, shall reach the borders, and before the possibility of a conflict with the Indian tribes, which we have reason to apprehend may be removed to that frontier. And to that end we respectfully request that Congress will take such measures as to their own wisdom and justice shall seem most proper."

Congress failed to appoint commissioners to meet those of Missouri; but the commissioners subsequently appointed by Congress made a report, which leaves the subject where they found it. They decided nothing. Questions of boundary have in all ages and countries been prolific sources of contention and bloodshed between individuals and nations. Every thing that can be done should be done to avoid such sad alternatives among the different communities of this happy Confederacy. Congress cannot now fix the boundaries of Missouri. They were defined by the law of March 6, 1820, authorizing us to form a Constitution, adopted in the Constitution of the State, and ratified by the General Government. The southern boundary of Iowa Territory can by Congress be made to conform to the claims of Missouri; but we must have our legal and constitutional rights; and, as a last resort, the courts of our common country may yet have to decide what those rights are.

Mr. LINN moved that the memorial from which he had just read an extract, together with the report of the United States Commissioners made during the last session, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The letter of Mr. CHAPMAN was then read, as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, the Delegate from the Territory of Iowa, begs leave of your honorable body to say, that from one of the city papers of this morning he perceives that one of the honorable Senators from Missouri has made a speech upon the subject of the disputed boundary between the State of Missouri and the Territory.

Inasmuch as the Territory of Iowa is necessarily without representation in your honorable body, (except so far as Senators generally have been pleased to treat her claims with great kindness,) and as the subject of the boundary for some days has been before a committee of the House, where the undersigned has been able to give it his personal attention, and where, some time since, the Representatives from Missouri were, by the committee, invited to attend, with the undersigned; he, therefore, had good reason, as he supposes, to hope that, until an investigation could be had by a committee, Missouri would refrain from charging the General Government with ill treatment.

If the undersigned might be permitted to refer to the liberality of Congress towards that State, he is sure that the recent addition of an immense district of country would not be the only instance of the liberality of the General Government towards the State of Missouri.

Your petitioner has no fears of the final result of this question. He only hopes that if nothing but the constitutional boundary will be accepted by that State, your honorable body will not consider it your duty, though possessed of the power, to extend her constitutional limits. Should the legal boundary be found to run through the heart of our flourishing Territory, our people have too much pride to stand out against the deliberate opinion of Congress, and seek redress elsewhere.

On the contrary, if it shall appear that Missouri already occupies more than her constitutional limits will allow, he hopes for an award of the balance found in our favor.

At this time, the undersigned forbears referring to any of the numerous documents in his possession, going far, in his opinion, to sustain the claims of the Territory, fearing that doing so previous to the subject coming before a committee, might be considered premature on his part.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your obedient servant W. W. CHAPMAN.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10, 1840.

Mr. LINN said he regretted exceedingly that his young friend, the Delegate from Iowa, had written and sent this letter here, as it was based upon misapprehension of his remarks, as uttered on this floor, and printed in the Intelligencer. He said he was determined the Delegate should have no pretext for saying that one of the Senators from Missouri had given him just cause for writing this letter, the object of which seemed intended for home consumption, and to show his constituents of the great care he was taking of the interests of Iowa. In his remarks, he had carefully abstained from entering into the merits of the question in dispute, and he could not refrain from expressing his surprise that the Delegate had so construed and characterized them. He was certain that, by no rule of construction, could they be so viewed On moving the reference of a message from the President, which contained information touching the controversy existing in relation. to the boundary line between Iowa and Missouri, he had taken occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the existence of a memorial from the Legislature of Missouri, presented to Congress nine or ten years since, which stated, in calm and respectful terms, the importance of not leaving that boundary line vague and unsettled until the question might become complicated, in consequence of the tide of white population flowing into that quarter, or the country be given to some emigrating tribe of Indians from some of the interior States. He had felt it his duty to call the attention of the Senate and the country to this memorial, to prove that the claim of Missouri to an extension of jurisdiction was not an after thought, or claim of but yesterday, and to show that her admonitions had been overlooked or disregarded; that the evils predicted from delay were now taking place. The memorial does not enter into the merits of the question; on the contrary, it states that the line was vague and indefinite, perhaps from the phraseology of the act of Congress of March 6, 1820, which authorized us to form a Constitution. Nor, Mr. President, has he argued the matter, for or against Missouri, nor endeavored in any manner to prejudice the opinion of this body against Iowa.

Mr. L. said that he knew the contest in this case was between the United Sates and the State of Missouri, involving, it was true, the interests of Iowa. If Congress possessed any undisputed power, she certainly had sole and entire control over the public lands, and over the Territories. This case was much stronger than existed in the contest between Ohio and Michigan, inasmuch as Michigan claimed to be a sovereign and independent State, and claimed certain rights under the ordinance of 1787. Notwithstanding this, Congress exercised her (in his opinion) undoubted power to prescribe limits to Michigan. In coming to this decision, which involved the boundaries of three States, it was possible that the decision was somewhat influenced by their votes in Congress, and by their political power. Missouri, in her constitutional sphere of action, is as free and independent as the United States. She has the same right to construe the act of March 6, 1820, as this Government. She has solemnly given her construction to it, and it remained for Congress to give hers.

Mr. NORVELL said that he should not have risen, but for the allusion of his honorable friend behind him from Missouri [Mr. LINN] to the case of the Michigan boundary. He had no doubt that the right cord had been touched, when the decision of that question had been ascribed to the number of electoral votes which were controlled by Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, on that occasion. He had risen, however, to second the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] to print and refer the letter of the Delegate from Iowa. He understood that it was couched in respectful language. It had relation to a boundary line, which that Territory claimed, of great importance to her. He protested against the idea that the Territory had no interest in this question. It seemed, from the whole action of this Government, to be considered that the people of the Territories possessed neither rights nor interests of any kind. He trusted that such a doctrine would no longer be entertained. He confessed that his sympathies were with Iowa in the present controversy, but certainly not so deeply enlisted as to induce him to do injustice to Missouri.

Mr. LINN said perhaps he had committed an error in his language; but he merely meant to say that, as a party to this question, Iowa had no interest in it. As a question to be settled, it lay wholly between the United States and Missouri. And would any body now say that the decision of Congress on this question would be binding on Missouri? Would any one say that Missouri could be forced into acquiescence to it? The ultimate appeal was beyond the reach of Congress, and if Congress did not settle it, the courts were open. Mr. L. preferred that Congress should settle it; but if they determined that Missouri had no right whatever to the Territory, and sent an armed power to enforce their edicts, he hoped they would be met by a spirit of resistance on the part of Missouri.

Mr. ALLEN said, the controversy between Michigan and Ohio was happily terminated; but he was not aware that the subject of Presidential electors had any thing to do with it. In the House of Representatives, when that subject was under discussion there, in 1834, in a speech which he made, he had taken the same ground as he would at present, viz: that the people of the Territory of Michigan had only a resulting contingent interest, but, as a party, no interest at all; because Michigan was not a party to the controversy, which was wholly between Ohio and the Federal Government.

But Mr. A had now risen chiefly to express his dissent from the doctrine of the Senator from Missouri, as to a final appeal on this question. The United States Supreme Court had no jurisdiction over this question by the Constitution, and into that jurisdiction it could not be drawn. It was a question between sovereign powers, with which that court, being the creature and representative of one of those sovereign powers, has no right to interfere, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. A. would remark, further, that he had never looked at this question as to the right of Missouri or the United States to this territory. But he hoped Congress would act on this subject purely in reference to such right as should be found to exist in the formation of the Constitution of Missouri, and without any reference whatever to the Presidential election, or any other question. If Missouri had a right to the territory, let her have it, without setting up as a scarecrow the Presidential election. Let her have exact and equal justice.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that this was in its nature a question purely judicial, and therefore one on which the Senate ought to act with perfect calmness and deliberation. They ought to hear both sides patiently; and their decision, whatever it might be, ought to carry with it that moral power which always resulted from strict impartiality and thorough, as well as calm investigation. But what did we then witness? The question had been discussed whether, in case Congress should decide against Missouri, that State would afterwards have the power of appealing to the Federal Judiciary. But could it be of any possible benefit to Missouri to discuss this question in advance? It was possible the question might never arise; and if it did, in consequence of a decision by Congress against Missouri, she might then pursue the course which she thought most compatible with her interest and her honor. The question as to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States over the subject could never properly arise in this body.

Again: an attempt had been made to renew the war between Ohio and Michigan in the discussion of this question. They had had enough of this war in the Senate in former years to satisfy any reasonable man; and he trusted that question would not then be conjured up to disturb our repose. It was now over and gone.

Mr. B. hoped the Senate would proceed and settle the real question in controversy, so far as it was competent for them to decide it, without entering upon an exciting discussion of one question which might never arise, and of another which had been already determined. He trusted that the letter would be referred to the Judiciary Committee without further debate.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said it was very far from his intention or expectation, when he presented this letter, to provoke the discussion which has followed it. The Senator from Missouri disclaims any intention of going into the facts involved in this question; but, said Mr. C. if, without doing so, that gentleman could succeed in establishing certain principles, which he advocated, to control the determination of facts, he thought they would result pretty much as he wished. This, said Mr. C. is a question of boundary—of course a question of fact, as well as law. Now, if the Senator shall succeed in laying down his own rules and principles, for the ascertainment of the facts, excluding such evidence as may not accord with his views, and admitting only such as may tend to sustain them, it is not difficult to conjecture how matters will eventuate.

The Senator from Missouri, however, said Mr. C. maintains that Iowa has no interest in this question—that it is a question which concerns Missouri alone, except so far as the United States may be a party. To any such position as this, Mr. C. said, he could not withhold the expression of his unqualified dissent. He asked, how happened it that the people of Iowa had no interest in a question which involved the curtailment or enlargement of their territorial limits? Had they not the same inducements to deprecate the one, or desire the other, that the people of Missouri had? It seemed to him, Mr. C. said, that the people of Iowa, shortly to become a State of the Union themselves, might be pardoned for any apparent unwillingness to have their limits contracted, and indulged in the solicitude, common to every other people, rather to have their Territory enlarged, their resources augmented, and their population increased.

Sir, said Mr. C. the ordinance establishing the Territory of Iowa, not only guarantied to the inhabitants certain fundamental rights—such as the security of life, liberty, and property—but also defined its boundaries. That ordinance constitutes a compact between the General Government and the citizens of the Territory, which he was not disposed to see violated, or lightly considered. Whilst he would be the last, Mr. C. said, to trench upon the territory or jurisdiction of Missouri, or any other State of the Union, he could not consent to aggrandize or build up one at the sacrifice of another. As he was not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, he had thought it proper to throw out these hints for the consideration of its members, before they came to any determination. He sincerely trusted they would give the subject, in all its aspects, the deliberation merited by its importance.

For himself, Mr. C. said, he had not investigated the subject; he felt, however, that it would be his duty to do so. He was entirely unprejudiced, would give it his attention, and felt determined, as far as he was capable, to do justice in the premises.

As to the question raised by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] in regard to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, he should not now express an opinion, as he thought it would be premature. It will be time enough to discuss that question after the Committee on the Judiciary had presented their report. Indeed, Mr. C. thought the whole debate was out of order at this time, and hoped it would now cease, and the memorial be suffered to go to the proper committee.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted whether the whole of this discussion was not premature. In justice to the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] he would say that, in his remarks yesterday, he did not consider him as trenching on the rights of Iowa. He hoped the paper would be referred to the appropriate committee, without further debate.

The question was then taken on referring the paper to the Committee on the Judiciary, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of Lucy P. Green, praying to be allowed the commutation pay to which her late father was entitled as an officer of the Revolutionary army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. P. also presented a memorial of Alexander Cummings and others, officers of the line, praying that they may be placed upon the same footing as to pay and promotion, as officers of the staff; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of Mary Blakesle, widow of a deceased Revolutionary soldier, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. M. ordered that the petition of Eunice Starr, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of James P. Delacour, in behalf of Eliza Delacour, widow of a soldier in the last war, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. ROANE, ordered that the petition of Jeremiah Fugitt, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. KING, ordered that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the report from the Secretary of State in relation to the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of Thomas Barnard, praying authority to locate a quantity of land on any of the unappropriated public lands in Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of John W. Monette, praying confirmation to title to certain tracts of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. W. also submitted a paper in relation to the petition of Joseph Radcliff; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Joseph L. Smith and others, praying that the Committee on Agriculture may be instructed to report annually on the condition of the agricultural interests of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Zadoc Martin, praying the right of pre-emption to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Washington county, Missouri, praying the establishment of an an additional land office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DIVISION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. WALKER, at the request of the Delegate from the Territory of Florida, presented the proceedings of a public meeting at St. Augustine, in East Florida, together with a memorial subscribed by many hundred citizens of the Territory, praying a division of the Territory, and that the Suwannee river be the dividing line; which he moved should be referred to a select committee of five, and be printed.

Mr. W. said he was decidedly in favor of the views of the memorialists, and the ultimate creation of two States out of Florida, one east and the other west of the Suwannee river. As there was no Committee on the Territories in the Senate, and as no judicial controversy was involved in this matter, but as it was simply a question of expediency, he had thought it proper to move the reference to a select committee.

Florida, as we received it from Spain, (said Mr. W.) was divided into two portions, designated as East and West Florida, and this was a natural division. West Florida borders entirely on the Gulf of Mexico. Into that gulf flow all its rivers, and into that gulf must its commerce be forever poured. It was different with East Florida; it was Atlantic in its position, and nearly all its trade must be carried to that great ocean. The entire Territory is believed to be larger in extent than any State in the Union; and the smallest division, as proposed, viz: West Florida, is much larger than either of the States of Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, or Massachusetts. Florida, west of the Suwannee, was not only much larger than either of these eight States, but larger, as was believed, than any two of these States combined. East Florida alone is about equal in superficial extent to the great State of Pennsylvania. So far as the extent is concerned, there can be then no objection to creaing ultimately two States, as proposed by the memorialists; whilst to create one State alone, would be not only to create a State of vast superficial extent, but of most inconvenient shape, stretching in an elbow from Cape Sable to the Perdido, a distance of nearly one thousand miles, and with nearly two thousand miles of seacoast. Mr. W. believed that the census would show that the population in Florida, west of the Suwannee, was already about equal to that of Arkansas when admitted into the Union, and therefore could be immediately admitted as a State; while East Florida could remain as a Territory until her population was ascertained to be sufficient for State purposes. He thought whilst two new States would soon be admitted from the Northwest, it was due to the South that two States should be created out of Florida, especially as there were so many very small States already situated in the North and East

Mr. CALHOUN said the matters embraced in the memorial presented by the Senator from Mississippi, in behalf of the people of East Florida, were of the greatest importance. There were many grave reasons in favor of the division of Florida into two States, and perhaps some against it. But as the subject would shortly come up, he presumed, on an application on the part of Florida to become a State, he thought it best to let the memorial lay on the table for a few days, when the whole subject could be referred together to the same select committee.

Mr. WALKER said he had no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, if he would call up the matter shortly; more especially as he (Mr. W.) was in favor of the immediate admission of West Florida as a State, and a simultaneous prospective provision for the speedy admission of East Florida.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would call up the matter at a very early day; and, with Mr. W's consent, the motion for the select committee was, for the present, laid on the table.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Henry Fry, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Julia L. Weed, reported unfavorably thereon: the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred a bill supplemental to the act entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," reported the same with amendments, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the memorial of John A. L. Norman, asking Congress to make a grant of land for the establishment of the Dade Institute of Florida, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend the act "to provide for taking the sixth census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," approved March 3, 1839; which was read, and order to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill granting to the Chicago and Galena Union Railroad Company the right of way over the public lands of the United States, and for other purposes; and which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill for the relief of Benjamin Parsons;

Mr. STRANGE gave notice that on to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Hazard Knowles.

Mr. WILLIAMS gave notive that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill to regulate the pay and emolument of the pursers of the navy.

Mr. RUGGLES gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Henry Stone and Charles J. Keller.

Mr. WALKER offered the following resolution,

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, JANUARY 21, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 8.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing ports of entry at Grand Gulf and Rodney, in the State of Mississippi.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. WALL and YOUNG, were severally considered and agreed to.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of the Territory of Florida now overrun by hostile bands of marauding Indians, being taken up,

Mr. STRANGE addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. TAPPAN submitted some amendments, which he proposed to offer to the bill, which were ordered to be printed.

The Senate then went into an Executive session, after which, it

Adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 10, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the subject matter before the House was the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, proposing to refer all the documents and testimony in relation to the New Jersey disputed election to the committee on that subject; and Mr. BELL's substitute therefor, declaring that the gentlemen without certificates should not be qualified.

Mr. RANDOLPH, who was entitled to the floor, was about proceeding, but was interrupted by Mr. GIDDINGS, who inquired of the CHAIR, whether he was not entitled to the floor, on the question of public printing.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] was entitled to it, on the question announced.

Mr. DAVIS submitted a motion to proceed to the election of Chaplain to the House; but

The SPEAKER ruled it out of order, without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. STANLY inquired if this was not the day to proceed to the election of public Printer.

Mr. WISE. That will come up at 1 o'clock.

Mr. RANDOLPH intimated that he was willing to yield his right to the floor, if the gentlemen of all parties were disposed to take the question.

Mr. CLIFFORD expressed his wish to address the House at large upon the question before it, and, for one, could not consent.

Mr. RANDOLPH then proceeded to argue the question at some length. He justified the clerks of courts in stepping over the laws of New Jersey when they had conceived, or it had come to their knowledge, that a fraud had been committed on the ballot box. They did not pretend to investigate the votes, but refused to receive an illegal return of votes; it was on that ground that the returns from the town of Millville were excluded; they were not received in the time prescribed by the laws of New Jersey. The law is express as to the time. The returns were not in conformity to the laws, inasmuch as they were not received for six or seven hours after the time prescribed therein, and until after the fact had been ascertained by the clerk that a large number of alien and illegal votes had been taken. They were not excluded from the return because the clerk had any right, under the law, to investigate the polls, but because of the knowledge he had received of the nature of the returns to him, by the return judges, of which, under the discretion given him by the law, he had the right to determine, as to the legality or illegality. He said the lists of the county clerks had been received by the Executive of New Jersey, and the question was started whether the Governor was not bound to send for the returns of Millville and South Amboy. He read the law, which made it the duty of the Governor to send by express for all absent returns; but he denied that the law contemplated any other returns than those of the county clerks, and maintained that he had no right to send for the returns of the polls. The clerks had exercised their discretion in excluding those polls, and the higher authorities of the State had no right to go behind the lists of votes returned by them. He was confident that was the right construction of the law; and cited cases where the returning officers, the county clerks, had exercised the same discretion, and had thrown out several townships, at different periods in the history of New Jersey. He was understood to admit, that, if the Governor had the power to go behind the county clerk's returns, he was bound by his oath to send an express for the polls; but the question had been raised by the Governor himself, before the Privy Council, whether it was not his duty, under the law, to send for the absent rejected returns. The president of the Council had examined into the question, and a different construction, and, he believed, a correct one, was put upon the law. And another question, he said, had been raised in the Council, whether those papers which had been read in the House as conclusive testimony, could be received by them. The Council decided properly that they could not; and he was correct heretofore in saying that the returns of Millville and South Amboy were not before them. Mr. R. then denounced the course the House had pursued towards the State of which he was now the sole Representative; and concluded by expressing to the House his consciousness of the great responsibility which had devolved on him in consequence.

Mr. SMITH of Maine regretted that he had been unsuccessful in his attempt to get the floor, immediately after the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] had taken his seat, merely to reply to that part of the gentleman's speech which related to himself. It was not his wish or intention to enter into the merits of the question of the right of the claimants to seats in the House as members from the State of New Jersey, believing, as he did, that the House had become heartily disgusted with the discussion of that question, and the reiteration of arguments, which had been so often repealed, that they were as familiar as household words. Nor did he consider the merits of that case as now legimately before the House, and open to discussion, under the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee to amend the resolution of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Election, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] The question upon that amendment did not, in the opinion of Mr. S. open the main question of right to seats, nor could it be the proper subject of debate, until the facts and evidence had been fully examined and reported by the committee to which they would be referred.

Mr. S. said, he only rose to explain and reply to a portion of the speech of the gentleman from Virginia, which had been introduced with special reference to the course which he (Mr. S.) had taken in the House. The gentleman had read from newspapers published in Maine, by the new friend and ally of the Whig party, the late representative from Cumberland district, an extract of a speech said to have been delivered by Mr. S. in the Legislature of Maine, in the year 1830; and had attempted to show a manifest discrepancy by a comparison of the principles and opinions avowed in that speech, with the course of Mr. S. in this House. Mr. S. was unable to say whether his remarks in the Legislature of Maine had been correctly reported in the paper from which the gentleman had read. It was utterly impossible for him to recollect, with any degree of distinctness or precision, what the tenor of his remarks had been upon the occasion alluded to. But he well remembered the case of Andrew Roberts in the Maine Legislature—the decision upon it, and the glorious results produced by it. That the case might be better understood by the House, he would briefly state it.

The House of Representatives of Maine, in 1830, was nearly equally divided. Neither party could count with much certainty upon a majority. In the Senate there were eight Democrats, and the same number of Federalists, and five vacancies, which, by the Constitution of that State, after the constitutional candidates had been designated by the Senators elect, were to be filled by such Senators and the House of Representatives in convention. Andrew Robertson appeared as the Representative of the town of Waterborough, in the county of York—with his certificate of election, and, notoriously, a large majority of the votes of the people in his favor. No other person claimed a seat from that town, and there was no evidence before the House tending to impeach, or in any manner control that certificate. But the Federal party had heard that Mr. R. had not been elected on the second Monday of September, the day designated by Constitution of Maine for holding town meetings for the choice of town officers, but that the meeting in Waterborough, having completed but a part of the business for which it was celled on that day, had adjourned to the day following, to complete the elections; and that, on that day, Mr. R. was elected. There was a mass of evidence in the case—sealed up—and which could not be examined, being directed to the Speaker; and the Federal party undertook to expel Mr. Roberts from his seat, and, to their disgrace, succeeded in the execution of that nefarious purpose. They then proceeded to elect their Speaker, which was done by a majority of one vote! they filled the vacancies in the Senate with their own men—and counted the votes for Governor in such a manner as barely to elect their candidate.

The proceedings of that Legislature would long be remembered by the people of Maine. They formed a most important epoch in the history of that State. What, sir, did they do? Suspend a member who had obtained a certificate, or commission, as some gentlemen pleased to call it, against a clear, decided, and acknowledged majority of votes thrown by the people—a majority not only proved by undoubted evidence, but confessed upon the floor by the member himself? Not so. But they rudely expelled a member from his seat who had his regular credentials, and the majority of the votes, and the law and Constitution, and right, and justice, all in his favor; and by this outrage elected their Speaker by a majority of one vote! What was the consequence of this outrage in that State? The people—the Democracy—had, at the next election, arisen in their majesty, and hurled the principal actors in these scenes from their places—redeemed the State from Federal thraldom, and, with the exception of a single year, had held the Government ever since.

The same result had followed the course of Governor Pennington in New Jersey. After the Congressional election in 1838, at which Messrs. Dickerson and his associates had been legally elected, the Governor undertook, for reasons expressed by him at the time, to give certificates of election to other gentlemen, who had received but a minority of the votes. The State election followed in 1839; and what was the verdict of the people upon his conduct? Instead of the hundred Democratic majority given in 1838 for Messrs. Dickerson and others, they threw nearly TWO THOUSAND Democratic majority. A more triumphant and emphatic expression of the voice of the people could hardly have been given. Could it be believed that, after the people had thus set their seal of disapprobation upon the Executive of the State, gentlemen would have the unblushing hardihood to appear here and claim seats under the "broad seal" of that Executive?

Mr. S. had, in the Maine Legislature, opposed the going into the investigation of the right to a seat—not contested by another—which had been gained by a majority of the people's votes, and which, by any evidence before the House, was not doubted or disputed. He would do so now. He would have been the last man to have refused the members from New Jersey holding the Governor's certificate, a seat in the House, had it not been proved by the clearest evidence, and by the acknowledgment of the members themselves, that such certificate was not in accordance with the majority of votes given for members of Congress at the election named in that certificate. That the commission given to those was an outrage upon the right of suffrage—a right forming the corner stone of the mighty fabric of freedom which had been erected by the patriots of the Revolution—a right, the violation of which by town officers, or county officers, or State officers, would inflict a deadly wound upon the liberties of the people. The principles and opinions expressed by him in the Legislature of Maine, Mr. S. still entertained; and when a similar case was presented, here or elsewhere, he should not fail to avow and reiterate them.

The gentleman from Virginia had remarked at the commencement of his speech, that if he had consulted his inclination, he should have remained, as he had done the first three weeks of the session, a silent but pained spectator of the proceedings of the House. But the high duty he owed to his constituents impelled him to come forward and manifest his deep and unmitigated hostility to the course which had been pursued by the friends of the Administration upon this and other questions.

Mr. S. had listened to the gentleman with great pleasure, and should have received additional gratification had he confined himself to the question under debate, and not travelled out of the record to attack, gratuitously and without cause, the course of gentlemen who differed from him in opinion, and to impute to them the vilest and most unprincipled motives for their conduct on this floor. The gentleman had stated, most broadly, that the majority of the House, in excluding the minority claimants from New Jersey, had been governed wholly by party feelings; disregarded right, trampled upon the Constitution, and violated the principles of common honesty. Such wholesale denunciations had been of common and every day occurrence during the whole debate upon this question, by many other gentlemen upon the same side with the gentleman from Virginia. As one of that majority, Mr. S. repelled the charge as false and unfounded, and he should feel it his duty, wherever, whenever, and by whosmoever it might be made, to hurl it back as a vile and base slander. The gentleman from Virginia had repudiated the doctrine of State Rights. Mr. S. acknowledged that he was right in that position. His whole course, his votes and speech, were utterly at variance with State Rights, with the immunities and sacred privileges of the people, for which State Rights men were the distinguished champions.

The gentlemen had accused the friends of the Administration of disfranchising the State of New Jersey. Mr. S. said it was not so. That it was the Governor and his Privy Council who had attempted to accomplish that object—that they had attempted to set at naught the will and to stifle the voice of the majority; and for it the speedy retribution of an abused and indignant people awaited them.

The gentleman seemed to be much annoyed at the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN.] It was not the first time, said Mr. S. that his friend from Ohio had been a thorn in the side of the Federal party. His speeches were not ornamented with rhetorical flourishes and high sounding words: they were made up of facts and figures, spread out in a plain and unvarnished manner, and expressed in clear and intelligible language, which carried conviction wherever they were read. The people—the bone and muscle of the country—sought them, and read them, and were convinced by them. But the gentleman from Virginia had declined to follow the gentleman from Ohio, or to attempt to answer his arguments, but contented himself, at one fell swoop, to pronounce the speech as containing more falsehoods and misrepresentations than any production he had ever seen. Mr. S. said this was a very easy and convenient way of disposing of an argument, which could not be successfully answered. It was the common method adopted by weak men when they were cornered by their competitors. It was like Governor Pennington's broad seal, which covered the Constitution and laws, the will, and the rights of the people; and which, like that seal, would fail to have effect with men of honest minds. But the gentleman pretended to be much disgusted with what he pleased to term the wanton attacks of the gentleman from Ohio. That gentleman, [Mr BOTTS,] said Mr. S. should be the last man in this House to complain of the wanton attacks of others. No man has used them more freely and more unreservedly than himself.

Had the gentleman from Ohio gone out of his way to attack individuals, who, after a long and eminent course of public duties, in the cabinet and the field, had retired from the public, service, crowned with honor, and were now upon the borders of the grave? Had the speech of the gentleman from Ohio been disgraced by an outrage like that? No, sir. It was left to the gentleman from Virginia to do that deed—to denounce, in his place here, Andrew Jackson, as one of the greatest tyrants which this or any other country had known! And, (said Mr. S.) he now repeats it, and shall have all the honor of the charge and its petition. But, (said Mr. S.) history in all time to come with brand, bone deep, the falsehood of that charge upon the head of him who makes it. Andrew Jackson a tyrant! The man who left the Senate of the United States, and the domestic comforts of his fireside, to volunteer in defence of his country—who rescued our bleeding frontier from the torch and the tomahawk—who expelled the merciless savage from our borders! Andrew Jackson a tyrant! who bared his bosom to the British bayonet, as well as the Indian tomahawk, and drove the trained bands of England from our shores, and saved "the beauty and booty" of one of the fairest cities in our land from pollution and desolation! Andrew Jackson a tyrant! who, after having restored peace to his bleeding country, resigned the "sword for the plough, and the spear for the pruning hook," seeking rest and retirement in the shades of his own Hermitage. Let the gentleman have the glory of making that charge—the veriest slave in the land will not envy him.

The question before the House, said Mr. S. is upon the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] to amend the resolution of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, by inserting two other resolutions. Mr. S. was opposed to such amendment. The resolutions contained statements which were untrue. They assigned a reason for the stand taken by the friends of the Administration, which was not the true one. The gentleman from Tennessee had, very gratuitously, in his second resolution, stated the cause of the suspension of Mr. AYCRIGG and his associates from their seats, to be to enable them to prove that there was no fraud in the Governor's certificate. Such was not the reason which had induced the votes which Mr. S. had given upon that question. He had voted to exclude those gentlemen from seats until they could show that the MAJORITY, which it had been proved was given against them by the people, and which they themselves confessed here, was a fraudulent majority. If that could not be shown, they surely were not entitled to their seats; and, until it was shown, they were and ought to be excluded.

The hour of 1 having arrived,

Mr. GIDDINGS inquired whether he was not entitled to the floor upon the subject of public printing, which had been postponed until this day, and whether that subject was not the special order of the day.

Some conversation here took place as to the propriety of disposing of the subject now under discussion, before going into the election for Printer.

Mr. BELL here withdrew his substitute for the resolutions of Mr. CAMPBELL, which he presumed would prevent any further discussion upon that subject, and would thereby enable the House to proceed to the election of Printer.

Mr. STARKWEATHER having obtained the floor, said it was not material as to the particular proposition on which he addressed the House, and he would, therefore, make his remarks on the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] Mr. S. then proceeded with his remarks for a short time; when he was interrupted by Mr. GIDDINGS, who again claimed the right to address the House on the question of public printing.

The CHAIR stated that the election of Printer was postponed to a day certain, and was not a special order, as the gentleman had supposed, and the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina consequently had precedence. He would also inform the House that the day had expired under which the order for the Clerk to employ a temporary printer could be executed, and that no printing could be done under it after to-day.

Mr. WISE thought the House had better go into the election of Printer, in view of the expiration of the previous order of the House, empowering the CLERK to have the printing executed.

Mr. FILLMORE concurred with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and did not consider that there was any other business of more importance before them than the election of public Printer.

Mr. DROMGOOLE thought they had better take the question on the resolution now properly before the House, and postpone the election of Printer until to-morrow.

The CHAIR reiterated his decision that the subject before the House was the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. GIDDINGS appealed from said decision; upon which question

Mr. GRAVES demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BELL here asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] to withdraw his appeal. It is admitted that this order is not a special order, and the business properly before the House is the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL. If the question on the appeal be pressed, we shall be compelled to sustain the decision of the CHAIR, or violate all parliamentary rules. The House could, by general consent, proceed to the election of Printer; but if it was a special order, any gentleman on the floor could interrupt the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STARKWEATHER] and demand that they proceed to the election; when the House would determine whether the business before it should go on or be laid aside for the special order. The question, however, as to the election of Printer, was only a postponement till a day certain; and therefore could only be taken up by the general consent of the House.

Considerable discussion here ensued, in which Messrs. GIDDINGS, CLIFFORD, STARKWEATHER, POPE, and GRAVES took part; the latter gentleman being of opinion that the election of Printer having been postponed until one o'clock to-day, had precedence at that hour, over the resolution then before them.

Mr. CLIFFORD said, the error of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] lies in this. He does not discriminate between a special order and a postponement to a day certain. The former must be taken up at the the hour designated, in preference to all other business, while the latter goes on the general orders, and comes up with them in its turn.

After some remarks from Mr. TILLINGHAST,

Mr. WISE called for the previous question on the appeal, which was seconded by the House.

Then on the question, Shall the main question be put?

Mr. ADAMS observed that, so far as he understood this question, the decision of the SPEAKER was contrary to the established practice of the House. Mr. A. was proceeding to discuss the point involved, when he was called to order, and told that an appeal was not debatable.

Mr. GIDDINGS said that, having been appealed to by several gentlemen around him, he would withdraw his appeal, and permit the discussion on the resolution to go on.

Mr. STARKWEATHER then obtained the floor, and addressed the House at some length on the general question of the New Jersey election, replying conclusively to the arguments of the gentlemen who have supported the claims of the certificate claimants. He took the constitutional ground that the people alone have the right to say who shall represent them in the Congress of the United States, and that neither the Governor, the Privy Council, nor clerks, of New Jersey, have a right to appoint their Representatives. He further showed that, as the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey have not the right to appoint Representatives for the people, neither have they the right to make evidence which shall exclusively be received to determine the fact of membership by the House of Representatives; for if they possessed the latter, they would necessarily possess the former. He repudiated the assumption that the House could not go behind the returns of a Governor of a State; for if this doctrine prevailed, the Government would, as a necessary consequence, be dissolved, because the Governor of a State, having the power to commission Representatives, with the power also to make the evidence of membership which the House could not go behind, might send Representatives here in opposition to the will of the people, and thus the Federal Government would be virtually overturned. [The speech of Mr. S. will be given to the readers of the Globe very shortly.]

Mr. CLIFFORD said, it was true that this subject had occupied most of the time of Congress since the opening of the session; and it was also true that that time had been chiefly spent in listening to speeches from the gentlemen who sustain the claims of the members commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey; for little of the time of the House had been occupied by those who oppose the claims of these pretenders, and who undertake to sustain the rights of the Representatives elected by the people. The first three weeks of the session he believed were entirely devoted to the subject; and he had supposed that, after the decision upon the final proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and after that gentleman himself had proclaimed that the victory was with the party in the majority—that the battle has been fought, and that he and his friends had lost it—that they would have suffered the matter, without further controversy, to go to the Committee of Elections. But when the honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. CAMPBELL] proposed a resolution having this object in view, every obstacle is thrown in the way—amendment after amendment is piled on it; and he had a right to complain when gentlemen undertake to pass by the question immediately before the House, and go into a discussion not only of the merits of the controversy, but into a discussion of the past decisions of the House, animadverting, with great severity, on the course of the majority, while he and others on his side of the question had not yet had an opportunity of saying a word on the subject. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] and others who preceded him, had taken this course, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] had been permitted again and again to occupy the time of the House, in reiterating the same arguments, and in reviewing the whole matter connected with the New Jersey elections. Up to this time, (Mr. C. said,) he had contented himself with giving a silent vote on the various questions that had been presented in relation to this subject, taking care that the effect of every vote should be to sustain the rights of the people; and he would still have continued to pursue that course had it not been for some remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] who made it the ground of complaint that those opposed to him on this question had not entered sufficiently into the discussion, and insinuated that their silence was caused not by a desire to avoid a useless consumption of time, but because of a want of confidence in the justice of their cause. Under these circumstances, and as the course of the House had been called in question, while the majority, of which he was one, had been so severely censured, he would ask the indulgence of the House while he explained the reasons and motives which had governed him and his friends in the course they had taken, promising that he would not unnecessarily consume the time of the House, and that he would be as brief in the remarks he was about to offer as the nature of the subject would permit.

As the official conduct of the Clerk of the House [Mr. GARLAND] had been frequently censured in the course of the discussions growing out of the case of the New Jersey contested election—as the Clerk had applied to the House to permit him to make a written statement explanatory of his conduct, which courtesy had been denied him, and as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] had complained that those who composed the majority of the House did not choose to discuss the question, after having refused permission to the Clerk to read his statement, he [Mr. C.] would make that paper a part of his speech, and read it as such; and he trusted that no gentleman would object to it.

Mr. PECK said he objected to a gentleman's reading, as a part of his speech, an argument concocted by another person, and addressed to the House, which he considered as out of order. Mr. P. observed at the time that he was willing to listen to a speech of any length that Mr. CLIFFORD himself might make.

Mr. CLIFFORD trusted that no gentleman on that floor would object to his reading, as part of his speech, a paper which the Clerk had offered to the House in explanation of his conduct, which had been so often called in question. In the little legislative experience he had had, he never knew this courtesy to be objected to, but in two instances; one of which was, in this House, where the objection was overruled, and the other was in the Legislature of his State, where the reading of a paper by a member was refused, because he was manifestly endeavoring to consume time unnecessarily. The House (Mr. C. said) had yesterday permitted the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] to have read from the Clerk's table a mass of ex parte depositions, and he therefore hoped a like courtesy would not be refused to him.

Mr. PECK still objecting—

Mr. CLIFFORD asked leave of the House to have the paper read; when

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and on taking the question, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Botts Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, S. H. Butler, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hillen, Holmes, Hook, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, J. Johnson, C. Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Thos. Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, J. L. Williams, Wise, and Worthington—110.

NAYS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Bell, Bond, Calhoun, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Edward Davies, G. Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, P. J. Wagner, E. D. White, J. White, Thos. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and S. Williams—63.

The House having thus decided that the statement might be read, it was read accordingly from the Clerk's table; after which,

Mr. CLIFFORD yielded the floor to

Mr. REYNOLDS, who moved an adjournment; and

Mr. STANLY having called for the yeas and nays, which call was not sustained, only 17 members rising in favor of it,

The question was taken by tellers, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 49; so

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, January 11, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a printed copy of the receipts and expenditures of the year 1839; which was referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The SPEAKER announced the order of the day; which was the resolution of the chairman of the Committee on Elections, [Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina,] proposing to refer to that committee all the papers and testimony relating to the New Jersey disputed election.

Mr. CLIFFORD, who was entitled to the floor, was about resuming his remarks; when he was interrupted by Mr. BOTTS, who prevailed upon Mr. C. to yield the floor, to enable him to propound an interrogatory to Mr. SMITH of Maine, in reference to his remarks of yesterday.

Mr. B. regretted that it was not in his power on yesterday to get the floor to reply to that gentleman. His position before that House and the country now, in consequence of those remarks, required that he should notice them, however much he regretted to be compelled to occupy the time of the House to reply to language of a personal and offensive character. In the first place, he would be pleased to learn from the gentleman from Maine whether he wished or intended them to apply in a personally offensive character or not? Mr. B. said he wished him to state distinctly to the House whether in the language, "a vile and base slander," used in reply to his remarks characterizing and denouncing the course of the Democratic party in the New Jersey disputed election—and his language, "that history, in all time to come, will brand, bone deep, the falsehood of that charge upon the head of him who makes it," in reply to my remarks denouncing General Jackson as a tyrant, was intended by him to have a personal application to me? He required a distinct answer.

Mr. SMITH said before he should consent to comply with the demand thus preremptorily made upon him by the gentleman from Virginia, he must first have the decision of the Chair, that he should be permitted to reply to any remarks in which that gentleman might be permitted to indulge after Mr. S should have made the explanation requested.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the gentleman from Virginia would not be permitted to make any remarks not in order; and that it would depend entirely upon the courtesy of the other gentleman from Maine, [Mr. CLIFFORD,] who was entitled to the floor, whether Mr. S. be afforded an opportunity to reply.

Mr. SMITH then appealed to the gentleman from Maine, who had yielded the floor to the gentleman from Virginia, whether he would extend the same courtesy to him to reply to that gentleman. To which

Mr. CLIFFORD replied, "certainly."

Mr. SMITH said he had supposed that the opinions advanced by him yesterday, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, had been expressed in language sufficiently explicit not to be misunderstood. He had endeavored to avoid all ambiguity, and to use the plainest terms of speech; and if he had failed to be apprehended by that, or any other gentleman, it was because he had not the ability to express himself with greater clearness. The sentiments he had uttered, were his honest and sincere convictions, and he should not hesitate, at all times, on proper occasions, to avoid and repeat them. Entertaining, as he did, the most exalted opinion of the late President of the United States, and holding his character and public services in the highest veneration and respect, he should never, here or elsewhere, permit them to be wantonly assailed without repelling, to the best of his ability, any attack which might be made upon them. The charge made by the gentleman, in his speech, wholly unprovoked as it was, in the opinion of Mr. SMITH, merited rebuke. But it was a principle well understood, that the character of public men is matter of opinion, about which individuals had a right to differ. Whether Andrew Jackson were, as Mr. S. believed him to be, a patriot, or, as the gentleman from Virginia had professed to believe, a tyrant was a matter of opinion. The gentleman had, in the strongest terms, denounced him as a tyrant of the blackest dye. Mr. S. had felt it his duty to say, in reply, what he was willing to repeat—that history, in all coming time, would pronounce that opinion erroneous and false. He had not, and he believed he could not have been so understood by any member of the House, charged any gentleman with uttering a wilful and deliberate falsehood. He had too much respect for the high station he occupied upon that floor to be guilty of so gross a violation of propriety. He had too much regard for himself, and those who sent him here, thus to insult the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. BOTTS said he understood the remarks of the gentleman as a disclaimer of any intention to attribute to him any improper motive, and that his language of yesterday was a mere matter of opinion; that history would speak in tones of reprobation of the language he had used towards General Jackson. He understood the gentleman as having disclaimed any intention of having used the remarks in the slightest degree as personally offensive to him: if not, he wished him distinctly so to state to the House.

Mr. SMITH was here proceeding to reply, by reiterating what he had before said, but was interrupted by

The CHAIR, who was of the opinion that no imputation had been cast by the gentleman from Maine in his speech of yesterday, on the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman. The CHAIR paid the most careful attention to the remarks of the gentleman, and understood his remarks to have a general application

Mr. SMITH of Maine said, that such, he would venture to assert, was the understanding of every gentleman on the floor.

Mr. DUNCAN asked permission of the gentleman entitled to the floor [Mr. CLIFFORD] to name a paper he intended to have introduced as part of his speech yesterday, as he contemplated inserting it in the printed report of that speech. It was nothing more than part of the first instalment of his speech delivered some days ago, and which some gentleman in the gallery had turned into rhyme, and sent to the Globe Office.

Mr. CLIFFORD was then about to resume his argument, when

Mr. PECK observed that, before the gentleman went on with his remarks, he wished to know if the CLERK had finished the reading of his speech. The CLERK had skipped the title page and part of the anecdotes, and as the House had required the whole document to be read, he wanted to hear the rest of it.

Mr. CLIFFORD said he did not acquiesce in the principle laid down by the gentleman. The House had granted him permission to have a certain document read, and he might avail himself of the privilege of using the whole, or a part of it, as he pleased. He had not, however, the slightest objection to the CLERK's reading the whole of the statement.

Mr. GASLAND, the Clerk, then read the notes and references appended to his statement—the statement itself having been read yesterday.

Mr. CLIFFORD then took the floor and completed his able argument, commenced yesterday; replying conclusively to the arguments of the several gentlemen who sustained the claimants commissioned by the Governor of New Jersey, and referring to various authorities and precedents which bore him out in the positions assumed.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania desired to say a few words on the subject then under discussion, and he should be as brief as possible in the remarks he was about to make, pledging himself beforehand to the House that he should not eke out his speech by calling for the reading of insolent lectures from a presumptuous subordinate, or any matter not strictly pertinent to the subject. He should proceed at once to the discussion of the question before the House, and, with its permission, would change his position. [Mr. C. then took a place on the floor nearer to the Chair than the one he occupied.] If he was not mistaken, Mr. C. said, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina, required that the Committee of Elections should report upon the returns and other papers, now in the possession of the House, before proceeding to a full and final investigation of the New Jersey elections, by purging the polls; and this amendment contemplated the rendering of more speedy justice to the State of New Jersey than would be done by the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina. He should, for that reason, vote for it. If wrong had been done to the State of New Jersey, the more speedily that wrong was redressed the better; and as the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee, offered as an amendment to the resolution of the Chairman of the Committee of Elections, contemplated the most speedy remedy, he should give it the preference. Let us enquire, said he, if wrong has been done to the State of New Jersey by the course of this House. As the question of the propriety or impropriety of the resolutions of the gentleman from Tennessee depended upon the question whether wrong had been done or not, let us, said Mr. C. examine whether the State of New Jersey has been injured by the course of this House or not. Mr. C. here, it being near four o'clock, yielded the floor to

Mr. CRANSTON, on whose motion

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, January 13, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the condition of the two per cent. fund reserved for making a road or roads leading to the State of Mississippi; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the amounts paid for private claims under special acts of Congress during the last five years; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 30th ult. which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the exaction of duties from, and the description of papers furnished to, vessels employed in the whale fishery; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of War, accompanied by a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with estimates of the appropriations necessary for the service of the Indian department for the year 1840; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Racine, in the Territory of Wisconsin, praying an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRENTISS presented a memorial on the same subject, which was referred to the same committee.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was ordered that the petition of the heirs of Joseph Rodedoux, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Adam D. Stewart; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of John Briggs, a Revolutionary soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of the heirs of James Mayson, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of John Scrivener, praying remuneration for property destroyed during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of William Hodson, praying remuneration for property destroyed by the enemy during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. M. also presented the petition of James Tongue, for the same object; which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. CRITTENDEN gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections.

On motion by Mr. BETTS, ordered that the petition of Lewis Newrisha, now on file, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, ordered that the petition and papers now on file in the case of Nahum Ward be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. KING, it was ordered that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the vestry and churchwardens of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Charleston, S. C. and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, presented a preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, which he asked might be read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolutions were then read, and were as follows:

WHEREAS, the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee have, on various occasions, when in their opinion the great public interests of the country demanded it, expressed, in the most solemn form, their views in regard to questions of a national character involving the welfare of the people of the United States, and have at all times, when deemed necessary to give practical effect to the sentiments which they entertained, availed themselves of the power which legitimately, and in conformity with long established Republican usage, throughout the Union, belonged to them, of instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives in Congress to carry out, as to specific measures, their declared wishes; and whereas, the extraordinary circumstances which have existed for the last few years in the financial and commercial interests of the United States remain unabated, and under causes of increased excitement and difficulty, originating, as we believe, in the same vast source of public mischief; and whereas, we do solemnly believe that to that source, the late Bank of the United States, is in a great degree to be attributed the oppressive calamities under which we have suffered and through which we are now actually passing; and whereas, during the history of the last few years we have seen this mammoth moneyed power struggling almost with success against the Government, and wielding a power in the production of panic and disaster, that, in the language of its boldest advocates, we were pronounced to be in the midst of a revolution; and the terrible evils which we have not only been taught it may inflict, and the present admonitions, which proceed from the last throes and agonies of that expiring power, justify us, and demand at the hands of the General Assembly, who should truly be the guardians of the happiness and prosperity of the people, any effort which can in any wise strengthen the councils of the nation against the recurrence of similar causes and results, and which may encourage the Administration of the country to adhere to its existing wise and prudent policy in regard to this great and absorbing subject: and

Whereas, the Constitution of the United States contemplates a Treasury to be held by the Government, wholly free from any necessary connection with banks, and the present crisis, as well as times past, have demonstrated the wisdom of such a measure; this General Assembly do most fully approve the policy heretofore recommended by the President of the United States in relation to what has been denominated an Independent Treasury, and believe that the passage of the measure brought forward in the last Congress, or some similar system upon this subject, would be not only prudent, but is absolutely demanded by the peculiar and remarkable vicissitudes which have acted powerfully upon the currency and commerce of our country; and, further, that such a measure would contribute to the more permanent stability of our institutions, the independence of the Government for all purposes of peace and war, to check the wild and extravagant spirit of the age that has come upon us with a reckless fury, and would ultimately tend to bring us back to sober reflection, steady pursuits, and the confirmed possession of an ample prosperity: and

Whereas, this General Assembly do believe, that the public domain of the United States should not be treated by the General Government as a mere source for the acquisition of money to the public Treasury, but by reducing the price to reasonable and moderate rates should rather be regarded as the great and extensive means of encouragement to the augmentation of our population, and the reward of the laborer and the husbandman, (by the grant of pre-emption rights) who in times of peril will be a powerful bulwark to the frontier, and the right arm of safety and defence against the hostile invasion of a foreign foe: and

Whereas, the liberty of speech and the freedom of the press are considered as invaded directly, or by implication, in the provisions of a bill which was brought before the Senate of the United States at the last session of Congress, entitled "a bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections:" and

Whereas, the people of the United States have long paid a tribute of millions to the monopolists of salt, under the tax which has been imposed upon the foreign importations of that necessary article, whereby the quantity which would otherwise have been introduced into the United States has been diminished, and the price to the consumer increased: and

Whereas, reviewing the history of our Government for the last ten years, a period which will be remarkable through all future time, and looking around upon the events now being daily developed, this General Assemby have reason to congratulate the country that its destinies were cast at the approach of the great and thrilling events which have, within that period, rapidly succeeded each other, in the hands of our venerable and patriotic fellow-citizen Andrew Jackson: and, whereas, his policy began the restoration of that system which was hailed in 1800, as the establishment of sound principles, and was steadily pursued by him and transmitted with the impress of his character to the hands of his distinguished successor: and, whereas, the firm and patient wisdom of the present Chief Magistrate, pursuing the same policy, has successfully conducted our domestic and foreign relations in the midst of peculiar and very extraordinary difficulties: Therefore, be it

1. Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote against the chartering by Congress of a National Bank.

2. Resolved further, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote for, and to use all fair and proper exertions to procure the passage of a measure brought forward in the Congress of the United States commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill, or Independent Treasury bill, the object of which was to separate the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public money from all banks, so as to make the Treasury of the United States independent of all banks, as recommended by the President of the United States in his several messages communicated to the last Congress of the United States.

3. Resolved further, That this General Assembly doth unqualifiedly condemn the provisions of a bill heretofore before the Senate of the United States at its last session, entitled "a bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections," which bill this General Assembly doth declare to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech and of the press," and they do as unqualifiedly condemn the vote given in favor of said bill by the Senators in Congress from this State, and our said Senators in Congress are hereby instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote against, and to use all fair and proper exertions to prevent the passage of the same or any similar bill.

4. Resolved further, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote against the measure heretofore brought before Congress, which had for its object the distribution among the States, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and that they be further instructed to vote for, and use all fair and proper exertions to procure the passage of, a law for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands, and for granting pre-em, tion rights to the occupant settlers thereon.

5. Resolved further, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote for, and use all fair and proper exertions to procure the passage of, a a law repealing the duties on imported salt.

6. Resolved further, That this General Assembly doth heartily approve the leading measures and policy of the Administrations of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren, and our Senators in Congress are hereby instructed, and our Representatives requested, to support, in good faith, the leading measures and policy as brought forward and advocated by the present President of the United States, and to use all fair and proper exertions to carry out, sustain, and accomplish the same.

7. And resolved further, That the Governor be requested to transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

JONAS E. THOMAS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
THOS. LOVE,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted 14th November, 1839.

Mr. W. said, that for the purpose of avoiding any misapprehension, or misrepresentation of his remarks in reply to the Legislature of his State, he would, with the consent of the Senate, read from a paper he held in his hand, that reply.

Leave being unanimously accorded, M. W. read, at great length, his reasons for non-compliance with the instructions, and concluded by resigning his seat as a Senator of the United States.

Mr. W. said, that is the answer which, if God spares me, I intend to send, without delay, to the Legislature of Tennessee. I am no longer a member of this body; of its honors I shall receive no share; from its labors I shall be excused, and from the high responsibility which rests upon it for this and for future generations, I am now absolved. I now part from this honorable body in the same spirit by which I have ever been actuated, while associated with them; wishing them, individually and collectively, every blessing which the world can bestow; and allow me to express the hope that their conduct will ever be such that at the last moment every individual can withdraw from the world with a quiet conscience.

Mr. GRUNDY was understood to say that, as to the instructions generally, he considered them as coinciding with his own opinions, and he thought he was prepared to follow them. He had no recollection of any instructions here that differed from his own views and practice, with a simple exception, which was that of the Independent Treasury. He had voted against that just before he left this body; but he had done so in obedience to instructions, and against his own judgment. He would now, therefore, vote in favor of it, agreeably to later instructions, and in accordance with his own judgment.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was ordered that the memorial of Samuel Norris be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the memorial of Benjamin Carleton; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. H. also presented the memorial of Nathaniel Gunnison; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. H. also presented the memorial of Abigail Carleton and others; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. H. also presented the memorial of Edward Ward and others, praying that provision may be made for granting pensions to the widows and children of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the army, who may die or be killed in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the Western Academy of Natural Sciences, at St. Louis, Missouri, praying the aid of the General Government in the purchase of a library and instruments, the erection of a suitable building, and the purchase of ground for a botanic garden for that institution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred a message from the President of the United States, transmitting information in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the banks which have recently suspended specie payments, &c. asked that they be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be laid on the table and ordered to be printed, and that two thousand additional copies be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also from the same committee, to which was referred a report from the Secretary of State in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, showing the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with all foreign nations, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that 2,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate; which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred a bill to authorize the New Albany and Mount Carmel Railroad company to enter, on a credit, a quantity of land to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, Indiana, to Mount Carmel, Illinois, and for other purposes, reported the same with some amendments, accompanied by a report in favor of the objects of the bill.

Mr. Y. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the petition of Enoch Baldwin, made a report thereon, (which was ordered to be printed,) accompanied by a bill for the relief of the owners of the British brig De patch; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS also, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to refund to Noah Miller and others a part of the proceeds of the sale of the British sloop Mary and cargo, which were captured by them, and libelled and sold for the benefit of the United States; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Archibald S. Campbell, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred a bill for the benefit of the Selma and Tennessee Railroad Company, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Josiah Sturges and others, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred a memorial of the president and directors of the Gainesville and Narkeeta Railroad company, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of said road, reported a bill for the benefit of the Gainesville and Narkeeta Railroad Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. CALHOUN,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate whether the Government of Great Britain has yet made compensation to our citizens in the case of the brigs Enterprise, Encomium, and Comet: the first of which was forced, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, in Bermuda, and the other two wrecked on the keys of the Bahama, and the slaves on board forcibly seized and detained; with the copy of any correspondence relating thereto which may have taken place since the answer of the call at the last session on the same subject.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance inquire into the propriety of modifying the duties on the importation of works in marble, so as to authorize the discrimination of the works of citizens of the United States residing abroad free of duty, and of other productions of fine arts at a reduced duty.

Mr. NORVELL introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a general bankrupt law.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to send to the Senate a copy of the report of Nathaniel West, commissioner to investigate claims against the Miami Indians, for the year 1839.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that to-day was set apart for the consideration of two bills reported from the Committee on Finance; but in consequence of the great importance of the unfinished business, he would not deem it his duty to press their consideration at this time: he, however, considered it extremely desirable that they should be taken up to-morrow.

SETTLEMENT OF FLORIDA.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of the Territory of Florida now overrun by marauding bands of hostile Indians was then taken up.

Mr. TAPPAN said he would ask the leave of the Senate to modify his resolution to recommit the bill with instructions. He wished that the committee might be able to take the amendments offered by himself, and the suggestions thrown out by other Senators who have spoken on the subject, into consideration, without any restrictions. He therefore modified his motion by striking out the words "with instructions."

Mr. BENTON said he desired, if no other Senator wished to make any remarks on the bill, to say a few words in conclusion. No other Senator manifesting a disposition to speak,

Mr. B. proceeded at length to address the Senate in reply to the objections raised against the bill;

And after some remarks in reply by Mr. PRESTON,

The question was taken on recommitting the bill with the amendments, which was agreed to.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, January 13, 1840.

Mr. PICKENS asked the kind indulgence of the House, while he called its attention to a matter somewhat personal to himself. He alluded to an article which appeared in one of the city papers on Saturday last. It had been his habit, for several years past, when any thing scurrilous with regard to him appeared in any of the vile and slanderous papers of the day, to pass it by with the deep contempt which its infamy merited. But his apology for noticing the publication he alluded to, arose from the fact that some others besides himself were implicated. A paragraph, Mr. P. said, had appeared in the Madisonian of Saturday last, in the following words:

"A gentleman long well known in this city, whose name and character we believe to be a sufficient guaarantee of his truth and sincerity, called upon us on Thursday last and divulged to us a secret of which he was possessed, and of which he had before heard some intimations, which will place the coalition in a point of view more shocking than any that has yet struck the public eye. The secret alluded to relates to the terms of a bargain consummated, as is said, between Blair and Rives, the candidates of the Van Burenites, and General

Duff Green, the candidate of the Calhoun Nullifiers, in respect to the printing of the House of Representatives.

"The substance of the matter communicated to us, is this: that General Duff Green has said in this city in the presence of a witness, that if Gales and Seaton would give him 8 per cent. on the bills for the printing of the House, he could secure them the contract—that he had been offered $10,000, a gross sum to be paid in cash, by another firm, (meaning Blair & Rives,) and that unless Gales and Seaton, whom he preferred, closed with him speedily, his friends having the balance of power in the House of Representatives, he should give it to Blair and Rives, or words to that effect.

"Messrs. Gales and Seaton, says our informant, would not 'hear to the proposal,' and he infers from the previous asseveration of Gen. Green, and from the fact, as he says, of a certain note of a large amount having been unexpectedly paid at the bank, and certain bail released, that the bargain with Blair and Rives was immediately closed, and the money, or a larger part thereof, paid over in cash.

"For ourself, we affirm nothing, except the substance of the communication made to us. Of the truth of that communication, we are authorized to state that, if it be denied, a witness is ready to substantiate it before a tribunal of justice."

Mr. P. said he would not detain the House by reading the balance of this paragraph, for upon the matters there suggested, he did not pretend to be informed. He did not know what General Green had said to any member of this House; but the charge to which he called the public attention was, that General Green was the candidate of the Calhoun Nullifiers. I appeal, said Mr. P. to those gentlemen with whom I act—and they are but few—and I, in their name—if it be intended by this artful slanderer to assert, that he has ever received counsel or assistance, directly or indirectly, from me or from them—I say it is an infamous falsehood. I do not mean to say that I have any knowledge of what General Green did or did not say to any person whatever, when I repudiate the idea that he ever was, in the slightest degree, our candidate. On the first day that I came here, I received a note stating that he would be a candidate, and could be elected—but, Mr. Speaker, you know how I treated that note. I never gave him the slightest countenance. I have risen merely to reply to the vile charge to which I have called the attention of the House, and I throw it back upon the author with the scorn and contempt it deserves. I have nothing more to say on this subject. The moment the Harrisburg Convention made its nomination, my mind was made up for whom I should vote. I think, said Mr. P. that this circumstance furnishes an additional reason why we should settle these low contentions growing out of the election of Printer, by going into that election at once, and then passing the resolutions of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ANDERSON] in relation to the final settlement of the matter, and separating the public printing from the political press hereafter. Mr. P. returned his thanks to the House for their kind indulgence, and took his seat.

Mr. HOWARD, of Indiana, asked permission of the honorable gentleman who was entitled to the floor, and of the House, while he moved a suspension of the rules in order to move the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary of Document No. —, on the subject of the Wabash and Erie Canal land claims, together with the resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana on the same subject, and the printing of the latter.

The motion requiring the general consent of the House, and Mr. PECK and several other objecting, it was not received.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The CHAIR announced that the question before the House was the resolution of Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, proposing to refer all the papers and testimony relating to the New Jersey disputed election to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. COOPER, of Pennsylvania, who was entitled to the floor, briefly examined the Constitution and laws with reference to this case. New Jersey, he said, had complied with the Constitution by electing men to take care of her interests on that floor, and that she had been grossly wronged when she was denied seats for her Representatives, who were legally returned under the seal of that State, which was in itself high and conclusive evidence of election, and could not be impeached by any collateral evidence in any court in the United States. But he did not claim that Mr. ACRIGG and his associates were entitled to seats on the commission alone, but that they were entitled, also, because they had received a majority of the legal votes of the people of New Jersey. All the precedents which had been quoted by gentlemen on the other side, without a single exception, (he said,) goes to sustain the claims of Mr. ACRIGG and his associates, the persons holding the legal credentials, and that they were entitled to hold seats in the first instance, until the matter should be properly investigated. He did not deny the power of the committee to go behind the certificate and investigate the election, and see if frauds had been committed by the county clerks, and even at the polls, but contended that New Jersey should be represented on the floor in the mean time, and the committee should first investigate the returns and decide who were entitled to hold seats until the other matters behind the certificates could be investigated. He dwelt on the injustice that would accrue to New Jersey should the House persist in depriving her of five-sixths of her representation. Important laws, he said, might be enacted—even war itself might be declared—and yet she would be deprived of a voice on that floor, and at the same time would have to share in the responsibility, and would be compelled to sustain those measures by her treasure and her blood. Mr. C. then referred to the various precedents, particularly those of Pennsylvania, which had been referred to in justification of the course of the House in this matter. He instanced the contest in the State of Pennsylvania between Bell and Brooks. Bell was permitted to take his seat in the Legislature, in the first place, and participate fully all the deliberations of that body, notwithstanding it was known that Brooks had a majority of the votes, and was prepared to exhibit proof of the fact. It was to the casting vote of Bell that rebellion in the State of Pennsylvania was made successful. Some gentlemen, as a justification of their course in the New Jersey contest, pretend that it was respect for the voice of the people which induced them to exclude her representatives from seats. This, he said, was to his mind a strange kind of respect for the people, to disregard the authority which the people themselves had constituted to make known their wishes—that the Governor and Council, under the organic law, was the only channel through which the people could make their voice be heard upon that floor or elsewhere. He contended that the Governor and Council were right in rejecting the votes of Millville and South Amboy, on account of informality—and that the Committee of Elections could not count them, because they had not been taken in conformity with the laws of New Jersey—that, in one instance, one of the inspectors had been excluded from a seat in direct violation of law, which, he was understood to say, was the cause for the rejection of the poll in the district in which he should have presided; if the principles of law, common sense, or precedents were at all to be consulted, that the Governor was perfectly justifiable in excluding those polls. He contended that Messrs. ACRIGG and associates, the gentlemen holding the certificates, had discovered two hundred and forty-one illegal votes—eighty-three alien, one hundred and forty-five non-residents, and others voting twice, and so forth—and that they were consequently elected by the legal votes given; and that this evidence had been properly taken, and was the right kind of evidence to produce to this House, and for the action of the committee. This, he said, was no contest in law; that the Democratic claimants had not approached that House in a legal and constitutional way; had not presented their petition to make it a regular contested case; and there was no evidence upon which to exclude Messrs. ACRIGG and company from seats. He contended that the statement of the Secretary of State was not legal evidence upon which that House could act; that it would not be received in any court, and therefore should not be accredited nor received by the Committee of Elections for their action.

Mr. C. then went into an examination of the speech of Mr. DUNCAN, which, in some facetious remarks, he compared with the landlord's supper in Don Quixote. The landlord, he said, had promised the traveller every dainty which the season could afford, but when he was pressed for his bill of fare, all that he could serve up for a supper was a mess of "cow's heels." So it was, he said, with the gentleman from Ohio; he had promised to prove, by indisputable testimony, that the gentlemen holding the certificates were not entitled to seats; yet, after all his great flourishes, and promises of facts, by which it was expected he would annihilate the claims of these gentlemen, he had, like the landlord, failed; he had served his mess of "cow's heels" by producing ex parte affidavits, taken by, God knows whom, and documents which had again and again been brought before the country. He concluded his remarks by occupying the same grounds which had been previously taken by other gentlemen on the same side of the question, and denounced the Administration party—contending that they had acted in this matter solely with a view to party interests, to secure the elections of Speaker, Clerk, and Printer.

Mr. LEET thought if ever there was a subject exhausted on earth, it was that relating to the New Jersey elections. We are now (said he) in the seventh week of the session, and, so far as this subject is concerned, we are just (said he) where we were at first—we have not advanced one step. He felt himself, therefore, under these circumstances, compelled to say that he would not inflict a speech on the House at this time, nor would he attempt to occupy its attention until it had received a report from the Committee of Elections. He had his opinions, and had avowed them sufficiently in the votes he had given, while he was prepared to vindicate them now; but he sincerely believed that further discussion in the present stage of the business, would be a useless consumption of the time of the House. Were he an old member, and had he a more extensive acquaintance with the members, he would venture an appeal to their good sense, and ask them if it was not time to do something on this question. I have listened with much pleasure to the arguments of my colleague, for whom I have great respect, and think that it may be answered conclusively; but would prefer taking the question without prolonging the discussion. Mr. L. said he rose on Saturday, and tried to obtain the floor, with a view to put an end to this interminable debate. The matter must ultimately be sent to a committee, and let it go there at once. Gentlemen could make their speeches when the report of the committee was before the House. The question now was on the motion made by the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, from whom it most appropriately came, and to have that motion decided upon without further useless delay, he would move the previous question.

Mr. RAMSAY appealed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable him to make a few remarks.

Mr. LEET withdrew the motion to allow an explanation from Mr. R. on condition that Mr. R. would renew it when he concluded.

Mr. RAMSEY thought that the House would concede to him that he was not one of those who delayed the business of the country by making long speeches on this floor; but, at the same time, he was unwilling to permit gentlemen to run away with the question entirely. He had the same right to be heard that was conceded to others, and would now proceed to answer some of the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. COOPER,] who had most wantonly dragged Pennsylvania into the arena for the purpose of covering her with disgrace.

[Mr. LEET here interrupted Mr. R. and said that he did not yield him the floor for the purpose of making a speech, but merely for the purpose of making an explanation. If a speech was to be made, Mr. L. said he was entitled to the floor, and was prepared to make it; but he thought further debate would be highly inexpedient, and that it was time that this apparently interminable question was put an end to.

The CHAIR said that Mr. RAMSEY was entitled to the floor.]

Mr. RAMSEY replied, that he regretted exceedingly the interruption of his colleague on such an occasion; and said that, as he had the floor, he would keep it until he had concluded his remarks. These, said he, as promised, shall be brief and to the purpose.

He had listened with much attention to the various arguments offered on this question since the commencement of the session, and he acknowledged that a great deal of legal lore had been elicited on one side, sustained by broad seals and quibbling technicalities; whilst on the other, the simple facts seemed to be mainly relied upon. He would not permit himself to go into an examination of the subject under the circumstances in which he stood, and would vote most cheerfully for its immediate reference to the Committee of Elections, in conformity with the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] To that committee it ought to have gone a month since. But, (Mr. R. said,) he rose chiefly for the purpose of repelling the charges brought against the people of Pennsylvania, the honest yeomanry of that State, by his colleague [Mr. COOPER] and others. He never would consent to set still in his place and quietly listen, for days and weeks, to the continued strain of invective there had been kept up here against his native State and her institutions, and would expose at once the presumption of the assailants, and the utter recklessness of their assertions. I say (continued Mr. R.) that my colleague has utterly perverted the conclusion naturally to be deduced from the Pennsylvania cases of contested elections, as cited and applied to the question now before the House. In truth, both questions are identically the same in the main particular—and that is in the high handed and daring attempt of the Governor and Council of New Jersey to appoint members of Congress in opposition to the expressed will of the people, and the infamous proceedings on the part of Governor Ritner, in issuing letters patent to men of straw to fill seats in the State Legislature, denied them at the polls. Both, sir, are revolutionary movements on the part of the Governors of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and they, with their retainers, Privy Council, Bank agents, Halifax rioters, and pensioned menials, strewed along the public works thick as the locusts of Egypt, are the worthies who should properly be branded as the authors of conspiracy and rebellion; they are the only persons who have attempted to trample the Constitution and laws under foot. The people of Pennsylvania stood by the Constitution and the laws, they upheld the drooping banner of freedom, and although denounced as canaille and dog-fighters on this floor, their boldness and energy outfaced the treasonable machinations of a band of conspirators worthy of Catiline and the degenerate days of Rome. Dog-fighters, indeed! (exclaimed Mr. R.) The honest yeomanry of Pennsylvania who assembled at Harrisburg, composed of the most wealthy and influential citizens of the State, a mob too! These declarations sound mighty well here, but those who know and understand the proceedings of the citizens concerned therein, will laugh to scorn this fishwoman slander. Why, sir, I maintain that if the people of Pennsylvania had permitted Governor Ritner and his Secretary to thrust into the legislative halls their menials and dependants, in opposition to legal certificates, a majority of votes, and the laws and Constitution of the land, as was the case in the county of Philadelphia, and the one presented at the opening of the Legislature, then they would truly have deserved all the very gentlemanly epithets that have been heaped upon them. But, sir, they proved themselves lineally descended from the same dog-fighters and mobites who rose in rebellion against a King and a Parliament; who owned the soil, who tilled it, who fought and bled, and finally achieved our glorious Revolution. Sir, I exult in the resistance of my fellow-citizens to the first attempt made to place collars upon their necks, and to convert them, not into dog-fighters, but into dogs themselves. It augurs well for the Republic, and the stability of our institutions.

I am sick to death of hearing about this everlasting mob at Harrisburg; and I would ask my chivalrous colleague why he and his valiant friends did not stand up like men, and cut off the heads and ears of this monster, instead of making tracks from the Capitol, North, East, South, and West, and even jumping out of the back windows. I happened to be present, with hundreds of the honest farmers of my neighborhood, and the scampering was truly laughable; the cow's heels that the gentleman talked about in his speech the other day, in reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] would not have answered the purpose there. Well, Sir, I was one of that mob; and so help me Heaven, if there is ever such another—if I ever witness an attempt on the part of a Governor and his humble Secretary to trample the Constitution under foot, for the purpose of carrying out the principle of "treating elections as if they had not happened," I will be amongst them once more, and if remonstrance will not do (making a significant gesture) he would go a step further. But, sir, I promised not to make a speech, and I think, under the circumstances, my colleague ought to have declined occupying the time of the House. Now, particularly, as it is extremely doubtful, to say the least of it, whether he is himself entitled to sit in this Hall. If I could call up the ghosts of the departed dog fighters and lazzaroni of the Millerstown district, I could a tale unfold; but without their supernatural aid, I pledge myself to prove here, that in this precinct, where there are but three hundred resident citizens, the gentleman himself, who talks so magnanimously about frauds, received 1,500 majority. "So much for Buckingham." I now move the previous question.

Mr. LEET asked if the motion for the previous question would not cut off the amendments, in case it prevailed.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on seconding the call for the previous question, and it was carried in the affirmative.

The preliminary question, shall the main question be now put? was also taken, and carried; when,

The yeas and nays having been called for by several members, they were accordingly ordered, and the main question being taken on agreeing to Mr. CAMPBELL'S resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That all papers or other testimony in possession of or within the control of this House, in relation to the late election in New Jersey for Representatives in the 26th Congress of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire and report who are entitled to occupy, as members of this House, the five contested seats from that State.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be served on JOHN B. AYCRIGG, JOHN P. B. MAXWELL, WILLIAM HALSTED, CHAS. C. STRATTON, THOMAS JONES YORKE, PETER D. VROOM, PHILSMON DICKERSON, WILLIAM R. COOPER, DANIEL B. RYALL, and JOSEPH KILLE, all citizens of New Jersey, claiming to be Representatives from that State in this Congress, and that the service be made upon each gentleman personally, or by leaving a copy at his usual residence; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers:

It was decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 176, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Black, Bond, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Anson Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Coles, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dillett, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Fillmore, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, Wm. S. Hastings, John Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Lawrence, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Medill, Monroe, Montanya, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Watterson, Weller, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Worthington —176.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Mark A. Cooper, Curtis, Everett, Rice Garland, William Cost Johnson, Proffit, Rayner, Russell, Saltonstall, Stanly, Storrs, Underwood, Edward D. White, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—16.

So the resolution was adopted, and the whole subject of the New Jersey election, with all the papers relating thereto, referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAVIS moved that the House now, in pursuance of the joint resolution of the Senate, proceed to the election of a Chaplain; and

Mr. CUSHING rose to a point of order, and contended that petitions had precedence over this motion. No opportunity had been offered since the commencement of the session for presenting petitions, of which he had several in his drawer.

By Mr. JARED W. WILLIAMS: The petition of H. Stevens and others, for the revisal of the law for protecting the revenue against frauds. Referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Also, the petition of Sally Stanley, for a pension. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, of Pennsylvania: The petitions from Beaver county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a national armory at the falls of Bever river, in said county, and also a resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania on the same subject, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, under a rule of the House.

By Mr. PETRIKIN: The petition and documents of Benjamin F. Wertly and Jacob Borton, were referred to the appropriate committee, under resolution of the 4th January.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, presented during the last week the claim of the heirs of Col. Francis Vigo, and the claim of James B. McCutcheon, both of Indiana, which were severally referred the appropriate committees, under the general resolution upon the subject offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky.

Mr. RAMSEY rose and asked leave to present a petition from sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, affirming that their rights have been violated by an individual's taking his seat in this House as their Representative, who was not elected by them; and asking an investigation of the frauds committed.

Mr. R. contended that the petition was a privileged question, relating to the organization of the House, and therefore had precedence over all other business.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked leave to present a similar petition, contending that it not only had precedence over all other business, but over all other petitions.

A desultory conversation then ensued in relation to the point of order involved, in which Messrs. RAMSEY, DAVIS, of Indiana, PETRIKIN, TOLAND, JAMESON, took part; when

Mr. RAMSEY insisting that his was a privileged motion, and asking the CHAIR to state his decision on it,

The CHAIR required Mr. R. to state the substance of the petition, in order that he might decide whether it was a privileged motion or not.

Mr. RAMSEY said the petition was from the voters of the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, complaining that an individual [CHARLES NAYLOR] had taken his seat in this House as their Representative who was not entitled to it; and the petitioners asked the House to investigate the frauds that had been committed, by which this individual obtained his seat. Mr. R. said he claimed the right to present this petition, as relating to the organization of the House, which ought to be first business before it.

The CHAIR decided that the petition was not of that character entitle it to precedence over other petitions.

Mr. RAMSEY appealed from the decision of the CHAIR; but subsequently withdrew his appeal at the request of several of his friends, and moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of referring the petition to the Committee of Elections. After the settlement and reference of the New Jersey case this morning, he hoped no gentleman would object to his motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE suggested to the House that there should be no objection to receiving and referring this petition, and he hoped it would be done by general consent.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked if the gentleman from Pennsylvania meant that all petitions were to have preference, or did he mean that this particular petition was a privileged question?

Mr. RAMSEY said he referred to the petition only that he now proposed to present; and if any gentleman objected he would call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GIDDINGS said there were objections; when

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and the question taken and decided in the negative, yeas 118, nays 77, as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Brigge, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gerry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, John Hill, of Va. John Hill, N. C. Holleman, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Naylor, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Toland, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Worthington—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bond, Brockway, Anson Brown Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Coles, James Cooper, Cranston, Curtis, Davies, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, William S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lawrence, Mallery, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Osborne Palen, Peck, Proffit, Randall, Randolph Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—77.

So the motion to suspend was lost, there not being two-thirds in the affirmative.

Petitions and memorials were called for in the order of the States and Territories, and were presented by Messrs. EVANS, RANDALL, ANDERSON, DAVEE, LOWELL, CLIFFORD, and SMITH, of Maine.

[Mr. SMITH offered a petition from citizens of Pennsylvania, in relation to the right of Mr. NAYLOR to his seat. Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS submitted that it was not in order for a member from one State to present petitions put into his hands by a member from another State, with a view to secure precedence. Some desultory conversation followed; and the SPEAKER having finally decided that the rule laid down by Mr. WILLIAMS was correct, the petition was not presented.]

Petitions and memorials were further presented by Messrs. JARED W. WILLIAMS, ATHERTON, and EASTMAN, of New Hampshire.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Massachusetts.

Mr. L. presented a petition in relation to certain frauds on the revenue, and moved its reference to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. ADAMS moved its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Some debate followed, when Mr. BOYD raised the question of order, that the petition, giving rise to debate, must, under the rule, lie over one day.

The SPEAKER decided accordingly, and the petition was ordered to lie over.

Mr. LINCOLN also presented sundry petitions praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories of the United States.

Mr DROMGOOLE rose and demanded that the parliamentary law be complied with, and that the question should be taken on the reception of the petition.

[Mr. LINCOLN'S voice was lost here amidst much confusion.]

Mr. D. read from the parliamentary law the following passage:

"Regularly a motion for receiving it [a petition] must be made and seconded, and the question put whether it shall be received. But a cry from the House of 'received,' or even its silence, dispenses with the formality of this question. It is then to be read at the table, and disposed of."

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the question of reception on the table.

Mr. LINCOLN said he wished it to be distinctly understood that he made no motion for the reception of the petitions. He took the ground that, under the Constitution of the United States, the people had a right to send their petitions to the House, and that the House was bound to receive and hear them.

Mr. ADAMS submitted to the Chair that his colleague [Mr. LINCOLN] had made no motion for the reception. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] had objected to the reception, and then the motion was made to lay on the table—what? The question of reception? No; the objection.

The SPEAKER said that, under the Parliamentary law, the question of reception must be raised, whenever the reception of a petition was objected to; and it was the question of reception which the gentleman from Tennessee had moved to lay on the table.

Mr. ADAMS. I deny that there has been any motion to receive the petition.

The SPEAKER read the parliamentary law quoted by Mr. DROMGOOLE, and said that the question before the House was on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ADAMS repeated his denial that any motion had been made to receive the petition.

The SPEAKER replied, that in that case, the petition was not before the House, but remained in the gentleman's possession. The fact that a gentleman presented a petition, was of itself, a motion that the House receive it.

Some conversation followed, and Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the question of reception on the table; which were ordered.

Mr. LINCOLN rose and said he wished the House distinctly to understand that he had made no motion for reception. He had offered the petitions to the House, and the House must dispose of them as it thought fit. If the petitions were not in the possession of the House, let the House, if it saw fit, decide not to receive them.

The SPEAKER said, if the gentleman withdrew the petitions, the motion to receive was not before the Houes. But if the gentleman presented the petitions, the question of reception, from that very fact, was raised.

Some further general conversation ensued, when

Mr. BARNARD inquired of the CHAIR who had made the motion for reception?

The SPEAKER said the motion was made by the very fact of offering the petitions.

Mr. BARNARD appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and seeconded the motion in a few brief remarks.

A desultory debate ensued, in which Messrs. STANLY, ALFORD, HABERSHAM, LINCOLN, DROMGOOLE, TRIPLETT, COOPER, of Ga. VANDERPOEL, took part; after which,

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the previous question; and the call having been seconded by the House,

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

In reply to a request of Mr. ADAMS, that the precise question on which the appeal was taken might be entered on the journal,

The SPEAKER stated the question as follows:

"The CHAIR decided that the presentation of the petition by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] ipse facto, raised the question 'Shall it be received?' although the gentleman from Massachusetts stated in his place that he did not make such a motion."

And the question on Mr. BARNARD'S appeal from the above decision was then taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 145, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, J. Allen, J. W. Allen, H. J. Andersen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carrol, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clark, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Doan, Doig, Dromgooel, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Howard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Newhard, Nisbet, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Proffit, Ramsey, Rayner, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Worthington—145.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Chittenden, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fletcher, Gates, Granger, Grinnell, Wm. S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, C. Johnston, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, Ogle, Osborne, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Russell, Saltonstall, Truman Smith, Storrs, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, and Thomas W. Williams—50.

So the decision of the SPEAKER was sustained by the House.

When the name of Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, was called, he rose, and asked the CHAIR what would be the effect if his decision be sustained with reference to the disposition of the Abolition petitions. According to his understanding of it now, he would be compelled to vote against sustaining the SPEAKER, and hoped he would be enlightened before he gave his vote. Objection was, however, made to any remarks whilst the vote was being taken.

The question was then taken on Mr. CAVE JOHNSON'S motion to lay the question of reception on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 131, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Dana, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hill of N. C. Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—68.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 14, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to the resolution inquiring whether Rock Island was still occupied by the Government as a military post; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial from certain citizens, praying a reduction in the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, the petition of William Tracey, praying an allowance of bounty lands, now on file, which has been heretofore committed to the Committee on Pensions, and a bill reported for his relief, was again referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of the president and directors of the Portsmouth and Columbus Turnpike Company, and citizens of Portsmouth, praying for an appropriation of public lands lying in the counties of Scioto, Pike, and Ross; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the petition of citizens of Milwaukie, praying confirmation of title; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. ROANE presented a petition of citizens of Prince William county, Va. praying a reduction of the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL presented additional documents in relation to the claim of the Michigan militia; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of James Williams, for indemnification for property destroyed in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of John H. Mackey; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, it was ordered that the petition of Jacob Bennet be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, it was ordered that the petition of John M. Moore, now on file, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from citizens of Oregon Territory, praying Congress to take possession of, and extend their jurisdiction over, that remote quarter of our Republic. Mr. L. said, as it was the first petition which had been presented from the distant Oregon Territory, and as it was exceedingly well written, and presented a lively picture of the commercial and other advantages of the Territory, he would, with the permission of the Senate, read a portion of it. After the reading, it was, on motion of Mr. L. referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

Mr. L. also presented the memorial of fifty-four citizens of the State of Missouri, on the same subject as the foregoing; which was referred to the same committee.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, it was ordered that the representatives of John Brooks have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill supplementary to the act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

Mr. N. remarked that, at the last session of Congress, a bill had been passed into a law, providing "that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any State, on process issuing out of a court of the United States, where, by the laws of such State, imprisonment for debt has been abolished." The object of this act was to make the Federal laws conform to the laws of the several States in relation to this important subject. He had understood that the act had received a construction in one of the courts of Michigan, by which it was decided to be inapplicable to such of the States as had, after the passage of our law, abolished imprisonment for debt. No matter what State might have subsequently abolished it, the Federal law would not, agreeably to the decision in Michigan, conform to the changed law of such State.

He was not disposed to question the correctness of the decision to which he had referred. It was, however, known to every Senator here at the time, that the act of Congress was intended to embrace all the States in which imprisonment for debt had, at the time of its passage, ceased to exist; and also, all the other States which might, after that date, pass laws to abolish it. One State had since done so; and as it was now certain that a difference of opinion existed as to the proper construction of our act, it was the purpose of the supplement which he had submitted, to provide for the application of that act to all the States which have abolished, and which may hereafter abolish, imprisonment for debt. He called the special attention of the Judiciary Committee to the subject, with a hope that they would bestow a favorable consideration upon it, and report the bill at an early day.

The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUGGLES, on leave, and in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. ROANE, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under three several treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers, which awards have been retained in the Treasury in payment of debts due to the United States; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred

The bill for the benefit of the Galena and Chicago Union Railroad Company;

The bill for the relief of Peter Warner; and

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Parsons;

Reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. also from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Bernard; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. also, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the appointment of a district judge for the district of the State of Mississippi, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the Plumb Island Bridge and Turnpike company; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of John H. Piatt, made an adverse report thereon. Mr. H. said that this claim had been regularly presented in one House or the other for the last twenty years, though unfavorable reports on it had been frequently made. He moved that the present report be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of E. H. and W. Smith, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. H. also from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of John Converse and Henry Reese, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. H. said that the Committee on Claims had already reported a general bill for indemnification for property destroyed in Florida; but in case that bill did not pass, on account of its containing principles which the Senate could not sanction, he was directed to report the following bills, which had been referred to that committee, without amendment, viz:

The bill for the relief of the legal representative of John J. Bulow;

The bill for the relief of Malachi Hagan; and

The bill for the relief of Philip Weedman.

And also, on a petition referred to that committee, a bill for the relief of Gad Humphreys; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, the bill making grants of public lands to certain States for purposes of internal improvement.

[The precise object of this bill, is to grant donations of lands to the other new States, equal in quantity to those which have heretofore been granted to the State of Ohio, for purposes of internal improvement within their respective limits.]

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred

The bill to authorize the Legislature of the State of Arkansas to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that State; and

A bill to provide for the defence of the western borders of Louisiana, Missouri, and Arkansas; reported the same without amendment.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the petition of Ira Day, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Francis Vigo, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. R also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Pierre Menard, Antoine Peltier, and Joseph Placy, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petition of William Cox, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRENTISS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Joseph Edson; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. P. also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri on the subject, reported a bill granting to each of the United States a township of land for the education and instruction of deaf and dumb persons; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING said he would call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that in consequence of the resignation of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE,] there was a vacancy in the Committee on Indian Affairs. That gentleman was its chairman. The usual course of the Senate in such circumstances was to appoint the next named in order as chairman. He therefore moved that Mr. SEVIER be appointed chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that the CHAIR appoint a member to fill the vacancy on that committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to communicate to the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken in regard to the selection of a site and the establishment of a marine hospital at the mouth of the Arkansas river.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following motion, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a marine hospital at Little Rock.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of the reports of Capt. T. G. Cram, of the Board of Topographical Engineers, upon the internal improvements in Wisconsin, including the construction of roads and the surveys of harbors and rivers, together with a map of Wisconsin, with the routes and rivers to be improved delineated thereon.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following motions, which, by unanimous consent, were considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the tri-weekly mail stage route which is established from Jacksonville, by way of Naples and Griggsville, to Clayton, in Adams county, so that said route may pass from Jacksonville, by Lynnville, Clear Lake, Pittsfield, Worcester and Payson, to Quincy, in Adams county.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill granting an extension of credit to the State of Illinois on duty bonds already given, or hereafter to be executed, on the importation of railroad iron into that State.

The resolutions submitted yesterday, by Messrs. CALHOUN, NORVELL, PRESTON, and SMITH, of Indiana, were severally considered, and agreed to.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money was taken up, when Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, moved its postponement until Monday, the 27th instant.

Upon this motion a debate ensued, in which Mr. CLAY, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. WALKER participated; and which will be given in to-morrow's paper.

The question was then taken on postponing the further consideration of the bill until Monday, the 27th inst. and was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Betts, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young.

The bill was then taken up, and after being read through,

Mr. WRIGHT made some remarks in explanation of the variations between this and the bill of the last Congress.

Mr. BENTON then moved an amendment to the 25th section, which provided a salary to the receiver at New York of $3,000, and to the other receivers of $2,500. He moved to amend it, by making the salary of the receiver at New York $4 000, and those at the other ports $3,000.

Mr. TAPPAN asked for a division of the motion; which being ordered, the question was taken on increasing the salary of the receiver at New York, after some remarks from Mr. WRIGHT, in favor, and Mr. DAVIS against it, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 23, noes 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Betts, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Lumpkin, Merrick, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, White, Williams, and Young—19.

The question was then taken on increasing the salaries of the receivers at the other ports, from $2 500 to $3,000, and decided in the negative—ayes 21, noes 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Strange, Walker, Wall and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs Allen, Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Lumpkin, Merrick, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tappan, White, Williams, and Young—22.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved that the salaries of the Treasurer of the Mint in Philadelphia, and the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans, who, by the provisions of this bill, were made receivers, in addition to their former duties, should be made equal in amount with the other receivers, $2,500 per annum.

Upon this motion a debate ensued, in which Messrs. BUCHANAN, MOUTON, NORVELL, SEVIER, and CALHOUN supported it, and Messrs. TAPPAN, HENDERSON, SMITH of Connecticut, and SMITH of Indiana opposed it; when, without taking the question,

On motion by Mr. ALLEN,

The Senate went into Executive session,

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1840.

Mr. BAKER, of Massachusetts, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to correct the journal of yesterday's proceedings, so that it might appear on it that when he presented the abolition petition on which Mr. DROMGOOLE raised the question of reception, and on which the CHAIR decided that the fact of presentation was in effect a motion for reception, he expressly disclaimed having made any motion to receive the petition, and distinctly stated that he would not make such motion.

At the request of the CHAIR Mr. L. reduced his motion to writing, as follows, and moved that it be inserted in the journal; "Thereupon Mr. LINCOLN expressly disclaimed any intention to move the reception of the petition, declaring that he neither had or would make such motion."

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to any entry on the journal of remarks make by gentlemen of what they would or would not do. The journal, he said, should contain nothing but the proceedings of the House, and not the desultory conversations of gentlemen with regard to motions that were not made. If this correction was permitted, the next thing would be, that gentlemen would ask to have their speeches spread upon the journal.

Mr. LINCOLN said he made no motion to receive the petition, and distinctly stated to the House, that he had not, and would not make any such motion, because he believed the House was bound to receive the petition, whether a motion to receive it was made or not. He stated this immediately on the question's being raised by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE.]

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, said that, as a matter of fact, he believed what was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts was true; and he would here advert to the importance of taking cognizance of matters of fact as they arose. He hoped he should be indulged in making an apology to the House for what might have appeared as a tendency to disorder on his part, when he rose yesterday and asked information of the CHAIR while the vote on this subject was being taken. His sole object then was, not to make a speech, but to obtain information on which to base his vote, and which, if he had obtained, would have induced him to give a different vote from the one he did. It seemed now that the gentleman from Virginia,

[Mr. DROMGOOLE,] moved the question of reception on the petition, and he was on his feet for the purpose of making the same motion, but owing to the previous question having been moved by the gentleman from New York, and the clamor that prevailed in the House at the time, precluded him from understanding the question.

Mr. JAMESON inquired if the journal contained the grounds on which the SPEAKER made his decision, and whether it was stated that it was in conformity with parliamentary law that the question of reception arose the moment a petition was presented. He wished to hear this part of the journal read.

The CLERK read it accordingly.

Mr. BROWN, of Tennessee, said it was time that the gentleman from Massachusetts did disclaim having made any motion to receive the petition, and that he further declared that he would not make such a motion. He was willing, therefore, that these facts should be inserted on the journal. But he wanted also another fact to appear, and that was that the gentleman, notwithstanding his disclaimer, did not take back his petition, but insisted upon its being received, and acted on by the House.

Mr. LINCOLN had no objection to the correction the gentleman proposed, but the gentleman, by looking at his motion, which he had reduced to writing, would find the substance of his proposition to be there stated.

Mr. CRABB stated his recollections with regard to the facts belonging to the case. The gentleman did not state that he neither had nor would make a motion to receive the petition, until after the CHAIR decided that the presentation of a petition was, in effect, a motion for its reception.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, said, it appeared to him that the journal was simply a record of the proceedings of the House; and that the mere fact of a gentleman's having stated that he would, or would not, make a particular motion, ought not to appear on it. It certainly would be, in his opinion, exceedingly irregular to make the correction proposed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, observed that he had intended to vote for the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts; but the remarks of his colleague were conclusive to his mind that it was irregular.

After some remarks from Mr. BRIGGS in favor of the motion,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON observed, that this was a matter of too little importance to occupy so much of the time of the House; and he would, therefore, move to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was carried—ayes 84, noes —.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Virginia, the Committee of Ways and Means was authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved that the Committee for the District of Columbia be authorized to employ a clerk.

This motion requiring a suspension of the rules, and being objected to, was not submitted to the House.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, handed to the CHAIR the following resolution, which was read for the information of the House, and moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer it:

Resolved, That upon the presentation of any memorial or petition, praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid upon the table, without debate, or further action thereon.

Mr. EVERETT asked for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. ADAMS moved the indefinite postponement of the motion to suspend the rules.

The CHAIR was of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not in order, because, if it prevailed, the effect would be that no motion to suspend the rules would be in order for the remainder of the session.

Mr. BLACK asked if the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON] to suspend the rules, should prevail, if it would be in order for him to offer an amendment to the resolution of that gentleman.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BLACK said, that in that case he would offer an amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was lost, there not being two-thirds voting in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, S. H. Anderson-Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Bynum, J. Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Coles, Colquitt, M. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, J. Davis, J. W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Fisher, Floyd, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, J. Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, J. Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Cave Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Rayner, Rives, J. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Sweeny, Taliaferro, F. Thomas, P. F. Thomas, W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, D. D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, E. D. White, John White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, C. H. Williams, S. Williams, and Worthington—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Baker, Barnard, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, J. Cooper, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, E. Davies, Doan, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Grinnell, Hand, William S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Chas. Johnston, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lowell, Mallory, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Peck, Prentiss, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Storrs, Swearingen, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, P. J. Wagner, T. W. Williams, and J. L. Williams—77.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections, asked leave to submit a resolution authorizing that committee to employ a clerk.

The motion not being in order but by general consent, and Mr. STANLY objecting, the resolution was not received.

Mr. HOFFMAN called for the special order, which was, the report of the Committee on the Rules of the House.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to the CHAIR whether the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the presentation of petitions, had not precedence over the special order. Mr. A. referred to a former decision of the SPEAKER, which he said was a case in point, and bore him out in the question he had raised.

The SPEAKER said that his decision was, that a special order, to have precedence over a class of business which, by the rules of the House, has priority over it, must have been made special by a vote of two-thirds; but that a special order, made such by a majority only, would take precedence over other business of the same class, not made special. There was a decision of his predecessor, he said, that the unfinished business had priority over a special order.

Mr. ADAMS wished the SPEAKER to make his decision on the question now raised, so that it might be spread upon the journal, and understood as the future rule of the House.

The SPEAKER replied that, if it was the desire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would put the question to the House for its decision thereon.

Mr. ADAMS said, that he had rather have the decision of the SPEAKER than of the House.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that the special order, unless passed by a vote of two-thirds, had not priority over the unfinished business of the day before. If the gentleman from Massachusetts insisted on the point of order raised by him, the CHAIR was constrained to decide that petitions had priority.

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the CHAIR.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and addressed the House at some length on the appeal.

Mr. TILLINGHAST took the floor, and was proceeding to discuss the question, when

Mr. FILLMORE called him to order, and read the following from the rules: "All questions relating to priority of business shall be decided without debate."

The CHAIR stated the question to be on the appeal of the gentleman from Virginia; when

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, and read the rule of the House with regard to the presentation of petitions.

Mr. HOFFMAN then stated that the report on the rules was made the special order for to-day, by a vote of more than two-thirds.

The SPEAKER said he was just informed by the CLERK that the special order was fixed for to-day by a unanimous vote—therefore it would be necessary to reverse his decision, and call up the special order.

The report of the committee on the rules was then taken up, and read by the CLERK.

The amendment to the 9th rule, making the vote of the SPEAKER conformable to the viva voce principle which had been adopted by the House, in the place of the ballot system, was concurred in.

The amendment of the committee to the 31st rule, proposing to restrict debate so as not to allow a member to speak more than once, without leave of the House, on a subject, "unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer, of the matter pending, in which case he shall be permitted to reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken," being under consideration,

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he could not give his consent to this amendment. He thought it smacked too much of the profession; and any one, from observing the effect of it, would suppose that a majority of the committee was composed of practising lawyers. It placed the rule on this ground: that great political questions here were to be argued in the same manner as cases before a court of law, where the plaintiff's council had the privilege of speaking the first as well as the last time. He had another objection to the proposed amendment. It destroyed that equality of privileges which ought to exist between all the members of the House; one member being allowed by it to speak twice, while all the rest were prohibited from speaking more than once. The advantage it attempted give to the mover of a proposition, would be something like the effect of the old law maxim, "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest." It would have another effect. By giving to the mover of a proposition the privilege of speaking twice on their own motions, the House would be offering a premium to induce gentlemen to make them, that they might have an opportunity of making speeches on them, to which no one could reply.

Mr. D. thought it would be better to let the old rule stand as it was, giving to every member equal privileges.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied to Mr. D. in defence of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK moved to amend the amendment of the committee, so that the duration of any speech should not exceed an hour. He advocated the amendment he proposed on the ground of economy of the time of the House, which was wasted frequently to the injury of the public business by long speeches, and contended that if the members would talk less and work more, great benefits would result therefrom.

Mr. DAWSON moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman, by adding, "and that each member shall have the liberty of transferring his hour to another, if he pleased." He was, however, opposed to a limitation in speech. He thought the more they spoke and the less they acted, the better it would be for the country—that the people would remain in ignorance as to the corruptions of Government, if debate should be confined to the limits which some gentlemen wished. The time had arrived when those who had talent should talk to the country. Though he believed that many dishonest speeches had been made upon that floor—speeches for party purposes, which did not contain one honest sentiment—yet he was unwilling, on that account, to put a restriction on debate, as he believed that the people could always discern what was right, and that which was wrong. Every member was entitled to speak; and he hoped they would be permitted to speak, and leave the country to decide who is who on that floor. He believed debate was a great conservative principle of our Government.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said he was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] if the amendment of the gentleman from New York should be adopted; and as it seemed to be the disposition of some to make us appear in the most ridiculous light possible, he thought they had better adopt another amendment to appoint timers, as they do on the race courses, to decide when the hour had expired. He was understood to be opposed to the limitation of time.

Mr. CLARK replied that this subject was not with him a matter of levity. He was in favor of restricting the interminable debates which take place in that House within proper bounds, and prevent, as it has done heretofore, the exclusion of petitioners from their doors. He did not agree with the gentleman from Georgia, that the less business they did, and the more speeches they made, the better it would be for the country. He was ready to subscribe to the reverse of that opinion.

Mr. BIDDLE said the House was always disposed to get upon stilts on all occasions; but he hoped they would consider this rule with great good sense, and come to a proper decision upon it. His honorable colleague, [Mr. SERGEANT,] he understood, had introduced this amendment in committee, and was sorry that he was not there to give his peculiar views upon the subject. He thought that no rule could be more equitable than that which allowed the mover of a proposition the right to reply when his motives might be assailed, and even the principle of the proposition itself misstated. He thought it nothing more than even handed justice that he be allowed the privilege to place himself right, and, as it might be, save his proposition. He disagreed with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] that this proposition smacked too much of the profession, and thought the practice in courts of justice which admitted right of reply was a most just rule of proceeding. He thought the proposition had been sufficiently debated, and, it in order would move the previous question.

The CHAIR stated that the effect of the previous question would be to cut off all amendments, and bring the House to a direct vote on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The previous question having been seconded by the House, and the main question ordered,

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment of the committee, which were ordered, and were, yeas 125, nays 73.

The amendments of the committee to the 42d rule, making "a motion to adjourn, and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, always in order and to be decided without debate," was next taken up in order.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to this amendment, and to so much patching up of the rules; he thought it would be much better the House would enforce what rules they now have. He was in favor of condensing the rules into a small space, instead of multiplying them into a large volume. This rule would inevitably cause much confusion to the business of the House, and consume more time than it would save.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a verbal amendment to the report of the committee, which the chairman [Mr. HOPKINS] accepted.

Mr. PETRIKIN was here proceeding to show that the adoption of this amendment, making more privileged questions, would have a tendency to retard the transaction of the business of the House; when he was interrupted by Mr. STANLY, and called to order.

Mr. PETRIKIN. I am in order. He hoped the gentleman would always ascertain whether he was himself in order, before he interrupted other gentlemen; and thought the House ought to adopt a rule to prevent insolent interruptions on every occasion, by persons who did not even understand the question before the House, or what the gentleman he interrupted was speaking about.

Mr. STANLY. I never do, except when the gentleman speaking does not understand what he is speaking about himself.

Mr. PETRIKIN. The interruptions of some gentlemen were so frequent and so insolent, that they were scarcely worth noticing. Mr. P. having concluded his remarks on the amendment,

Mr. C. JOHNSON thought the gentlemen who were in favor of having the private business transacted, should look to this amendment. He believed the effect of it would be to force questions to adjourn over from Friday till Monday, at the sacrifice of that class of business which is usually passed upon on Saturdays. He, for one, would certainly vote against it.

The question on this amendment was about being taken by count, when

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOND did not think that the effect of the adoption of this rule would be to sacrifice the private business, as had been contended by the gentleman from Tennessee. He believed it would operate as favorably upon that class of business as the rule did as it now stood. He was, however, in favor of a majority of the House having the power to adjourn the House to any time it thought proper.

The yeas and nays having been previously ordered, were, in the affirmative 98, negative 74.

So the amendment was adopted.

The amendment to the 44th rule, so as to make the rule as amended read as follows:

"The previous question shall he in this form, 'Shall the question be now put?' It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effects shall be to put an end to debate, and bring the House to a direct vote upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question."

Mr. S. WILLIAMS offered an amendment to the amendment, the effect of which was not understood; and

After some remarks by Messrs. HOFFMAN, TILLINGHAST, EVERETT, and BANKS,

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to amend the amendment by striking out "amendments reported by a committee," so as to have the question taken first upon all pending amendments in their order.

After some remarks from Messrs. REED and BRIGGS in favor of Mr. TILLINGHAST'S amendment, and Mr. BIDDLE in opposition,

Mr. WELLER obtained the floor, and moved the previous question, which was seconded, and the House was brought to a direct vote on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 101, nays 95.

So the amendment of the committee was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HUNT,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1840.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial of Van Dorm, Pease and Company, [Iron Mountain Company of Missouri,] asking a right of way, through the public lands, for a railroad from the Iron mountains, in Missouri, to the Mississippi river; also the right to enter 500,000 acres of the public land at the minimum price, to aid the company to construct said road when it shall be located; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented a joint memorial and resolutions from the Legislature of that State, requesting the establishment of a new land district, to embrace the territory lately acquired from the Cherokee tribe of Indians, within the State of Alabama; and also to reduce the minimum price of the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of a number of the members of the bar, in the State of Missouri, praying an extension of the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States holden at the city of St. Louis; and an increase of the salary of the district judge of the United States for the district of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. L. also presented a memorial of a number of citizens of Missouri, praying a donation of land to settlers in the Oregon Territory; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD,

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing Tyler Shepherd of Vermont a pension, under the act of June 7, 1832.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE,

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to General Duncan L. Clinch, for losses sustained by him in Florida by Indian depredations.

Mr. NICHOLAS offered the following resolution; which, by unanimous consent, was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the survey recently made of the mouths of the Mississippi and adjacent coast.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: A portion of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, a part of these United States, has been invaded, and at this moment is occupied by British troops. By the late message of the Governor to the Legislature of the State of Maine, now in session, we learn not only the fact of invasion, but also that the Governor of that State has communicated it to the President, and officially called for that action on the part of the General Government which the case requires, and the Constitution and laws of the land enjoin. What that action will be is unknown to me, but I trust that it will be such as the honor of the nation demands.

I desire to know, and that the Senate and the country may know, all that relates to these portentous movements; and in order that we may have the information in an official form, I offer the following resolutions, and hope that they may be considered and adopted at this time:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence which has been had between this and the British Government upon the subject of the Northeastern boundary, and of the jurisdiction of the disputed territory, which has not been communicated heretofore; or so much of it as, in his opinion, may be communicated without prejudice to the pending negotiation.

Resolved, That the President be further requested to communicate to the Senate all the correspondence which has been had, since the last session of Congress, with the Government of the State of Maine, and with the Minister of Her Britannic Majesty at Washington, relative to the invasion of the State of Maine, and to the exercise of jurisdiction within the disputed territory by either party.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had no objection whatever to the passage of the resolution; but, as it related to a matter of great importance, he hoped the Senator from Maine would permit it to lay over until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS acceding, the resolution was laid over until to-morrow.

The resolutions submitted yesterday by Messrs. FULTON and WHITE, were severally considered and agreed to.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of the heirs of Colin Bishop, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the bill making appropriations for the completion of certain roads commenced by the United States in the State of Michigan, reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the bill to refund the money paid, and to cancel the bonds given to secure duties upon vessels and their cargoes employed in the whale fishery was taken up, and after some remarks by Mr. D. it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A bill for the relief of John McCarty; and

A bill for the relief of A. G. S. Wight, were severally considered, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of certain persons therein named, was was taken up, but pending the consideration thereof, the Senate passed to

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The bill to provide for the collection, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursment of the public money.

The question was on the amendment submitted yesterday by Mr. BUCHANAN, that the salaries of the Treasurer of the Mint in Philadelphia, and the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans, who, by the provisions of this bill, were made receivers, in addition to their former duties, should be made equal in amount with the other receivers, $2,500 per annum.

Mr. GRUNDY then offered as a substitute for the above, a proposition to increase the salary of the Treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia five hundred dollars in addition to his present salary, and the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans dollars in addition to his present salary, as a compensation for the additional duties enjoined by this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN accepted the modification.

Mr. SEVIER moved that the blank in the amendment be filled with $2 000; which was not agreed to—ayes 12, noes 27.

Mr. ALLEN then moved to fill the blank with $1,000, (making his compensation $3,000;) which was agreed to—ayes 25, noes 13.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER then moved a reconsideration of the vote giving the receiver at New York a compensation of $4,000.

The question was taken on reconsideration, and decided in the negative—ayes 20, noes 21.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the Senate then informally passed the bill, and proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; after which it

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January, 15, 1840.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of S. C. chairman of the Committee of Elections, by unanimous consent, moved a resolution that the said committee be empowered to employ a clerk.

Mr. STANLY inquired if it had been usual to grant to this committee a clerk.

Mr. CAMPBELL did not wish to detain the House by any remarks; but it was obvious that the labors of that committee had been much increased, and—[cries of "agreed, agreed."]

CHAIR. By general consent, the resolution is received.

Mr. LEADBETTER wished to know, before voting for the resolution, what would be the compensation. It appeared by some of the printed documents, that the clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means had heretofore received more compensation per diem than the members themselves, which he thought exorbitant and improper.

Mr. CAMPBELL understood that it had been usual for clerks to committees to receive four dollars per day, and he would so amend the resolution that the compensation should not exceed that sum per day.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved an amendment; "and that the clerk receive pay during the time he be employed;" which was understood to be accepted by the mover.

Mr. REYNOLDS called for the yeas and nays, as he believed there was no necessity for these clerks to committees.

Mr. CAMPBELL would not detain the House by a statement at that time; but if the committee were not allowed to employ a clerk, its labors would be very great indeed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, thought that it was extremely desirable that the House should be put in possession of information relating to the different cases before that committee at as early a day as practicable. We know that cases referred to that committee embraced numerous depositions, which would make its labors arduous in an extreme degree, to put in such form as would be proper to report for the information of the House; and it seemed to him that the public required, and that the people of New Jersey required, as early a report as possible on the disputed seats of the Representatives from the State of New Jersey. He thought, unless gentlemen wanted that report delayed until the end of the session, they should vote for this resolution. He sincerely hoped it would pass.

Mr. DOIG, to put a stop to unnecessary debate, moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question was ordered, which was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REYNOLDS renewed his motion for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. RARIDEN, on his motion, was excused from serving on the committee on expenditures in the Department of War.

Mr. HOFFMAN called for the order of the day; when

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order was the unfinished report of the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. HOFFMAN said, before proceeding to the consideration of the last resolution, he wished to submit an amendment to the rules, to admit within the hall the United States District Attorney for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that no amendment could be offered until the amendments reported by the committee should be first disposed of, and that the motion of the gentleman from New York could not now be received.

Mr. ADAMS wished to know if that amendment was within the province of the committee.

The SPEAKER said he had already decided that the amendment could not be received—the question before the House being on the resolution reported by the committee to remove the seats from before the desks of the members, after the present session.

Mr. HOFFMAN said the committee on this resolution was unanimous. It had been proposed by one member, and agreed to by all the rest. Perhaps it might not be within the competency of the committee to report it, but it seemed to him to be within the objects for which it was constituted. They supposed it was within the province of the committee to bring in such rules and orders as would facilitate the transaction of public business, and prevent disorder, which too often occurred there. He considered that one of the best means to effect that object, would be to take away the desks before the seats of members. The committee thought that the members were too comfortable there to do the business of their constituents. We cannot confine the gentlemen who wished to speak to one hour, as was proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK.] on yesterday, and they had set up no hour glass, nor had they the water glass of more ancient times, by which to measure the speeches of the members. He thought it better to make the seats of members as uncomfortable as possible, and they would the sooner rid themselves of the tediousness of debate, by vacating them. As it was now, the speaker might look round to see if members were not tired of so long debate, and he found almost as many members in their places at the conclusion, as he did at the commencement. Remove the desks, and adopt benches, and the countenances of members would soon indicate to the speaker that it was time for him to stop.

Mr. H. referred to the mode in the House of Commons, where they have benches, as a precedent to govern the House of Representatives. In that body, he said, where there were six or seven hundred members, they did not occupy near as much time as they did in that House, which he attributed solely to the uncomfortable manner in the arrangement of seats. He thought it much better to compel members to write all their letters and resolutions at home, and come there with their propositions and business cut and dried ready for the action of the House. On a score of economy, he thought it best to remove the desks; that it would expedite the public business more than any other rule which could be adopted.

Mr. BANKS did not rise to make a speech on the question before the House. He happened not to be present at the session of the committee when this particular proposition was agreed to; but had he been present, he should have opposed it there as he would here. He concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that this proposition was not within the province of the committee. It did not go to amend the rules, nor did it make a new one. But what was the intended effect of the proposition? The gentleman from New York said that it would force members to be less prolix in their speeches, by removing the conveniences which enabled the listeners to prevent ennui and weariness during the delivery of a long speech.

But what are gentlemen to do when they want to write amendments to bills pending before the House, or how are they to keep themselves informed of the detail of public business when they have no means of keeping and referring to the documents printed for their use? Would the gentleman have the members of this House rushing to the Clerk's table every time they wanted to write an amendment or refer to a document? Did he not see the confusion and disorder that would thereby ensue? But the gentleman introduced the practice in the British Parliament, which he highly extolled and recommended for our adoption. I am, sir, American in all my feelings, and do not want to go to the British Parliament for an example. Our practice in this respect has been tried for a number of years, and has been highly beneficial. It was a remarkable fact, that the plan now proposed by the gentleman, was tried for a long time in the Virginia Legislature; but finding the inconvenience and disorder resulting from the members having no place to write their amendments, that body caused their Hall to be furnished with desks. Mr. B. hoped the resolution would not be adopted, and moved the previous question on it.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS said, if it was in order he would move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HOLMES said, the CHAIR had decided that it was not in order to introduce it into the rules, as it did not come under the rules of the House, or within the province of the Committee on the Rules. If such was his decision, a motion to lie on the table was not necessary.

The CHAIR said that was not the motion he decided to be out of order.

Mr. ADAMS said he made the objection, because it was not in order for the committee to introduce the resolution, and understood the SPEAKER to decide that it was not in order.

The SPEAKER said he did not decide upon that point; but he decided that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] to admit the district attorney into the Hall was not in order at the time he made it. As the gentleman, however, made the objection, the CHAIR decided that the resolution was in order.

Mr. BANKS had no doubt that the decision was correct; for the CHAIR decided on questions of order and not consistency.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS said as the CHAIR decides that the resolution was in order, he would inquire whether it is in order to move to lay it on the table.

The CHAIR was of opinion that, as the resolution was a separate proposition, it was in order to move to lay it on the table.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS then moved to lay on the table that particular resolution.

The question was then taken on laying it on the table, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 119, nays 52.

Mr. COLES said he believed it was now in order for him to move an amendment to the 54th and 55th rules; and he would therefore submit the following, which he hoped would receive the favorable consideration of the House.

"All petitions, memorials, and papers touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or transferring of slaves in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, shall, upon their presentation, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

Mr. ADAMS said he had a substitute which he would offer for the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER would inform the gentlemen that it was not in order to submit their motions, because there were other amendments to the rules proposed by a member of the committee, [Mr. BANKS,] with its approbation.

Mr. BANKS observed that he would waive the consideration of his amendments for the present. He was not anxious about them, though he would like to have some of them considered at a more favorable opportunity.

The SPEAKER said, that being the case, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. COLES] had the floor, and it would be in order then for him to offer his amendment.

Mr. COLES's resolution was then read; after which,

Mr. COLES proceeded to address the House in its support. He observed that a resolution, substantially the same, had received the favor of the House at each of the four last sessions of Congress, and he should think, from the service it had performed, it ought to be entitled to a kind reception. That resolution, he said, was almost a literal copy of the one passed at the second session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, and familiarly known as Mr. Patton's resolution. There was no material difference between the two. He would not detain the House by saying any thing more on the subject, but as he had some weeks ago proposed to the House a measure of a similar character, which was not then received, a brief explanation would be necessary. It was known to the House that the subject of Abolition petitions had created much disturbance here, as well as throughout the country. It was believed that there had not been a dozen members here who would have voted to grant the prayers of these petitions. But day after day, week after week, and month after month, the subject involved in them had been debated on that floor, not only obstructing the business of the House, and denying justice to other petitioners, but creating excitement, jealousies, and heart-burnings throughout the country. Surely, sir, we can prevent the mischiefs that these petitions are calculated to produce.

If we cannot prevent them from coming into the House, we can at least get over the difficulties in which the conflicting views of members with regard to them have occasioned. Some gentlemen think that they should be received, while others think they should not; some think that they should be received and rejected; some think that they should be received and laid on the table; and some think that they should be referred to a committee, with instructions to consider and report on them. Then there were other gentlemen who were of opinion that the petitions should be heard at the bar of the House. Amongst these conflicting opinions, gentlemen had been able to unite, at the session of Congress he before referred to, on a measure somewhat similar to the one he now presented; and he, therefore, having been admonished by the experience of several sessions, had thought that, by bringing it forward, it would serve to put an end to the agitating questions which would otherwise be likely to occupy a considerable portion of the time of the body. It was manifest that such measure was necessary to the peace of the House. Mr. C. was not disposed to sacrifice the rights of the South, and no man, residing in his district, could ever be made to believe that he was capable of patterning with this subject for any personal or party purpose; and he should, therefore, say no more on that point. His constituents wished no aggression on the rights of others. They only asked to be let alone. He offered no proposition calculated to abridge the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances. But when the people had exercised that right, and had petitioned, he denied that they had any right to say that their petition shall be granted, or to prescribe to Congress its course of action on their petition. If he had his choice, he would be disposed to throw all Abolition petitions into the fire, or out of the doors or windows; but if a majority of the House would not consent to the mode of disposing of them that he preferred, but were willing to adopt the course of the last session, and lay them on the table without reading, debate, or any action whatever, he would unite with them. He was aware that another proposition was about to be offered, which was a similar one to that submitted by his colleague [Mr. WISE] the other day. Mr. C. preferred his own resolution because it was a tried measure, and had united the votes of the House at four different sessions of Congress; the effects of the two were identically the same; for, if the one received the petition, the other did also. If gentlemen would inquire what had been the practice of the House and of the Senate for several years past, they would find the effects of both modes of disposing of a petition practically the same; for laying the question of reception on the table, carried with it the petition also, and it went accordingly into the clerk's office, and was placed on the files. He was not, however, so partial to this resolution as to object to any amendment that would effect the objects he had in view. If the House chose to adopt the phraseology of the resolution adopted at the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, or the phraseology adopted at the second session of the same Congress, or, if it chose to adopt the phraseology of the resolution of the last session, he would be perfectly content. The same principle pervaded the whole of them. Having seldom troubled this House, he thought it was due to himself to make this brief explanation, and as he had said nothing which rendered it obligatory on any gentleman to reply to him, he would move the previous question.

Mr. GRANGER rose to address himself to the justice of the gentleman from Virginia, and to request him to withdraw his motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from New York that no debate could be allowed on the previous question.

Mr. GRANGER said no debate was intended. He asked for the extension of that invariable courtesy which had never been refused on that floor, and to be permitted to ask the gentleman from Virginia, as he had made remarks utterly at variance with the recollections of gentlemen on that floor, that he would withdraw his appeal.

Cries of order, and Mr. GRANGER being called to order by the CHAIR, took his seat.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, moved to lay the amendment on the table, with a view of offering a substitute.

Mr. CROSS called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PECK moved for a call of the House. There were some Northern slaves there, he said, whom he wanted to be emancipated. Mr. P. then called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 113.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, to lay the resolution on the table,

Mr. SLADE raised the point of order, that, inasmuch as the rules of the House are for conducting its business from day to day, this resolution proposed a rule of action for the whole session.

The SPEAKER ruled the resolution to be in order, it having been received and acted on by the House: it was too late now for the gentleman from Vermont to raise the question of order.

Mr. BOTTS asked to be excused from voting on the question, and was proceeding to discuss the question; when

The SPEAKER informed him that it was not in order to discuss the merits of the proposition on a motion to be excused.

Mr. TRIPLETT moved that the gentleman from Virginia have leave to proceed.

Mr. CHAPMAN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and

Mr. PECK moved a call of the House, but subsequently withdrew his motion. We have, said he, some refugee slaves from the North that I wish brought in.

Mr. BOTTS hoped that the gentleman who had so kindly moved for liberty for him to proceed with his remarks would withdraw his motion.

Mr. STANLY. If the gentleman does withdraw the motion, I shall renew it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, asked if the gentleman was allowed to make a speech, if it would not be in order to answer him.

The yeas and nays were then called on allowing Mr. BOTTS to go on, and resulted—yeas 93, nays 104.

Mr. BOTTS then withdrew his motion to be excused from voting, saying that he would excuse himself by walking out of the House.

Mr. MONROE moved to be excused from voting; which motion was rejected—ayes 23, noes not counted.

The question was then taken on Mr THOMPSON'S motion to lay the amendment of Mr. COLES on the table, and resulted—yeas 102, nays 98, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Black, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Colquitt, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dillett, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, Fletcher, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Graves, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hillen, Hoffman, James, Charles Johnston, Wm. C. Johnson, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Pallen, Parmenter, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Sterrs, Stuart, Sumter, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, J. Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Deberry, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gorgas, Graham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of Va., Hill of N. C., Holleman, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nath'l Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lee, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Ramsay, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sweeny, Taliaferro, Philip F. Thomas, Triplett, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagner, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—98.

Mr. THOMPSON then offered his substitute, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition, praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate, or further action thereon.

Mr. ADAMS submitted to the CHAIR whether his substitute had not priority. He offered it (he said) as soon as the gentleman from Virginia had offered his.

The SPEAKER replied, that he had informed the gentleman that it was not in order for him to offer his resolution when the gentleman from Virginia had the floor. The gentleman did not offer it at any other time.

Mr. ADAMS. Very well, sir; I shall yet find a time.

Mr. EVERETT raised the question on the reception of Mr. THOMPSON'S resolution; and, after a discussion on the point of order involved, in which Messrs. EVERETT, LEWIS WILLIAMS, BRIGGS, and SHERROD WILLIAMS, took part, Mr. EVERETT withdrew his objections.

Mr. TILLINGHAST rose to a point of order, which he reduced to writing, as follows:

"That it is not in order to adopt or move a proposition, as a standing rule of one House of Congress, which, if adopted and made a standing rule, interferes with a constitutional obligation of the House, as one branch of Congress; impairs the right of petition, as secured by common law and by the Constitution; and precludes appropriate, constitutional, and discriminating action by the House upon petitions of its constituents, respectfully addressed to Congress, whenever the same are, or may be presented; and that the proposition moved by the gentleman from South Carolina as and for a standing rule, is not in order on that account."

The CHAIR decided that this could not be entertained as a point of order, it being matter of objection to the adoption of the proposition on its merits.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, then addressed the House at length in support of his motion, and concluded by moving the previous question.

Messrs. GRANGER and MONROE asked the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw his appeal, to enable them to make some remarks.

Mr. THOMPSON declining,

Mr. GRANGER said he much admired the chivalry of the gentleman from South Carolina, who made a speech, and, by moving the previous question, cut off a reply to it.

Mr. MONROE again appealing to Mr. THOMPSON, he, amidst much noise and confusion, withdrew his motion; when

Mr. MONROE addressed the House at some length in explanation of his views on the subject, and concluded by moving the following, which the CHAIR permitted to be read for the information of the House.

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, and addresses of every description, touching the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the States or Territories, or in any manner relating to the existence of slavery or the slave trade in the United States, be referred, without debate, to a select committee, with instructions to consider and report thereon.

Mr. GRANGER then followed, and, in a speech of some length, contended for the right of petition, which he said would be outraged by the adoption of the resolution. We have arrived at a point at which it is proposed to engraft on the rules of the Representative Assembly of the freest Government on earth, a standing order by which no paper shall be received which presumes to speak on a question of personal liberty. Here was an opinion practically consistent with Jeffersonian principles, practically consistent with modern Democracy! He asked if, in a Government like ours, we had arrived at a point at which the only question that could not be discussed in that House was a question involving liberty or slavery. Mr. G. after denying that he was an Abolitionist, said, if gentlemen would continue to press this question in this form, they would find enlisted under the banner of Abolitionism a number of gallant spirits at the North who would never quail; and that it would then be discovered that the South was not the only part of this nation possessing moral force, and which, knowing its rights, dares maintain them. Mr. G. expressed the hope that a resolution would be offered referring these petitions to a committee to consider and report on them, though he could not approve of making any standing order of the House on the subject.

Mr. CRABB felt it due to himself to make a few observations in explanation of the vote he gave. He voted against the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, not because he believed it was a gag, but because it was not, in his opinion, gag enough; and for this vote, he was announced, in the Abolition paper of New York, as being one of those opposed to the gag. He had intended to make a publication in answer, defining his reasons for the vote he gave, but when he came to consider the source from whence the charge was made, he thought it best to treat it with silent contempt.

The charge, however, was transferred from that paper to an Administration paper in his district, and used in the elections against him. In reference to the right of petition, on which gentlemen laid so much stress, he thought Northern gentlemen were mistaken on this subject. The Constitution provided that no law should be passed prohibiting the people from assembling to petition for a redress of grievances. Now he was not disposed to interfere with this provision. Was it a violation of this right for Congress to refuse to receive petitions on a matter with regard to which it had no jurisdiction? Gentlemen on all sides, with a very few exceptions, admitted that Congress had no jurisdiction on the subject; and, besides, had these abolitionists grievances to redress, or had they a right to intermeddle and petition for a redress of grievances which they might suppose to exist in another part of the Union? The right of petition was consummated, when the petitioners had assembled and made their petition, and they had no right to require Congress to grant their prayer, or to prescribe its action on it. Mr. C. after a few remarks, expressed his regrets that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] had withdrawn his motion for the previous question; and as he believed that further discussion would be injurious, he renewed the motion, and reluctantly gave notice that he could not withdraw it.

Mr. GENTRY, and several others, asked the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the previous question, and it would be considered a great obligation conferred.

Mr. CRABB said he was as desirous as any gentleman to speak on that subject; but inasmuch as he regretted that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] had withdrawn his motion for the previous question, he thought the debate would take a wide range, and be injurious; and he could not consent to withdraw it.

The House was then about being divided, to ascertain whether there was a second to the motion for the previous question, and tellers having been called for, Messrs. GRIFFIN, of South Carolina, and ANDREWS of Kentucky, were appointed as such; who reported that there were—ayes 72, noes 87.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. GENTRY said, without regard to what effect it would have upon him personally, he felt impelled by a proper sense of duty to state what his convictions were as to the best course for the House to pursue upon the exciting question before it. As a Southern man, he repudiated the idea that this was a question which was confined to or interested the South alone. He considered that the whole Union was interested, inasmuch as any thing which went to overthrow or affect the peculiar institutions of one section, by an infraction of the compact, would affect the whole Union, and the common cause of freedom itself. It therefore should be looked to with a single eye as to the most wise course to be pursued to allay the excitement, and prevent the dangers that might accrue from the agitation of the subject. He concurred with the views of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MONROE,] that the battle was at present to be fought in the North, and he thought it extremely improper for Southern gentleman to place their friends from the North on that floor in a position which was untenable at home, and which, he believed, favored the schemes of the Abolitionists; that, it was their great object to prevent. The Abolitionists, whose great principle of action is agitation, could not be better pleased than by the passage of the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON.] It would strengthen their ground by blending their cause with the great Constitutional right of petition. It was by this species of argument that they had been enabled to maintain their stand in the North thus far, and the House should legislate, so as to deprive them of that argument to advance their cause. He thought the representatives from the South should look at this question practically, without passion and resentment—to meet it, and discuss it—to receive the petitions—refer them to a committee to be reported upon—such report to show why it was that the prayers of the petition could not be granted. He believed that such a report would have as beneficial effect in causing this agitation to subside, as the great Sunday mail report had in allaying the excitement it was intended to operate upon. It was from these considerations that he was in favor of the resolution offered a few days ago by a gentleman from Louisiana. [Mr. CHINN] who, he was informed, was as much interested in having this question settled as any man upon that floor. He believed that if they met the question frankly, by taking the course suggested by him, their friends in the North would successfully do battle there, and put down those agitators. He trusted that the patriotism of the North and the South would meet, and, through the channel of a committee, make such a report as would settle the matter definitely. He believed the best interests of the South required the course indicated by him, and for that reason he would vote against the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina. [Mr. THOMPSON,] in the hope that it would thereby enable him to vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana. [Mr. CHINN.] Mr. G. having concluded,

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, obtained the floor, and on his motion

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 16, 1840.

The CHAIR presented the credentials of DANIEL STURGEON, elected a Senator of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, for the term of six years, from and after the 4th day of March, 1839; which were read.

The CHAIR submitted a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, praying an appropriation for the completion of the road from Dubuque to the northern boundary of the State of Missouri.

Also, a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, praying a donation of land for the improvement of the navigation of the Iowa and Cedar rivers; and

A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, praying the survey of Skunk river; which were severally referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, in favor of the survey of the lands in that Territory, to which the Indian title has been recently extinguished; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented the memorial of George Whitman, praying compensation for the aid and responsibility afforded by him to Government agents in 1836, in raising money for the prosecution of the operations against the hostile Creek Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of John H. Sheppard, administrator of Abiel Wood, deceased, praying to be released from a judgment recovered by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial of a number of manufacturers of cigars in the city of Baltimore, praying an increase of duty on imported cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. PHELPS presented the petition of a number of citizens of Rutland county, Vermont, praying a reduction of the postage on letters; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the memorial of a committee of the American Silk Society, praying the aid and patronage of the Government in the printing and distributing the journal of said society.

In presenting this memorial, Mr. CLAY said, while I am up I will remark that, in my opinion, there is hardly a production in which this country is engaged which is more important to be duly attended to at this time than that of silk. As an agricultural product, it is appropriate to all parts of the country. And among the causes which have occasioned the unexampled state of distress from which no portion of this wide country is exempt, which has increased, is increasing, and I wish to God I could see any hope of its end—at least among the foreign causes of this remarkable state of distress, is unquestionably that of purchasing so much abroad. Sir, we must make more at home, and bring less from abroad, if we would remove the causes of distress; and this remark is applicable to our own productions in every form, of agriculture as well as of fabrication. And in regard to silk itself, look at the facts. For seven years past, the annual amount of it brought into this country has been $12,500,000, and one year it rose to $20,000,000; and this $12,500,000 is for an article which, if any thing, is for the adornment and luxury of man. Silk is that article.

Sir, no country can long withstand, for which the annual imports exceed the exports by some $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. And, if I was not absolutely powerless, if my friends and myself had any power in the direction of this Government, I would to-morrow impose a duty equal to the maximum which the compromise act admits, that is, 20 per cent. on this import of $12,500,000 in silk. I would lay this duty on silk; and with a view, in part, to prevent a dangerous excess of revenue, I would distribute the annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the States as their own property, to which they are already entitled; and let this fund assist them to liquidate their debts, and to foster those great interests which are justly dear to them, so far as there is now freedom from debt. I would impose this duty on silk and on other luxuries, and if the lands are not necessary to the support of this Government, I would distribute the proceeds of the lands among the States who are entitled to them. But we, or at least I am not in the condition to do what I have suggested, and therefore I cannot do otherwise than to ask that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and printed.

Mr. CALHOUN said: I rise to make no opposition to the motion, but to make a few remarks connected with those topics which are now of chief importance; and I hope that not much more of this season will pass, before we shall go deeply into that subject. The country is now at a point at which it has become of far more interest than ever.

Sir, I differ in toto from the Senator from Kentucky as to the causes of distress; and, if I am not mistaken, they are the very opposite of what have been assigned. To revive the old, the tried, and condemned American system, would be ruinous in every branch of industry, and especially to the manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial interests. The distress which he ascribes to the importation of silk comes from other causes. He looked upon any measure that would, at this time, increase the credit of the States so as to enable them to sell more bonds in foreign markets, as positively injurious. We ship our credit, and bring in goods. I hold the very reverse of what the Senator has indicated as the true policy, and I hope for an early opportunity of pointing out that policy, and that at an early day we shall look deep into the subject.

Mr. CLAY. This is a little unusual, to engage in a discussion on this subject thus before the time. Sir, have I proposed or suggested a revival of the tariff further than the compromise allows? Not in the slightest degree. I merely proposed a duty on silk, as an article of luxury, entirely consistent with the compromise. Sir, what was it that I proposed? It was simply that the maximum duty of the compromise—that is, twenty per cent.—should be imposed on silk, which is in no way incompatible with the compromise.

And how can this injure the manufactures of cotton, shipbuilding, or any thing else, which are now nearly prostrated? The woollen manufacturer at the North is almost entirely stopped, and that of iron itself is among the most languishing. How can the duty on this luxury affect either the manufactures or agriculture of the country? It will benefit them; for it will directly aid the manufacture of silk, and, if raw silk is produced with success, it becomes a fit object for importation, and it may aid greatly in removing that ruinous excess in the balance of trade, which will crush us all, unless the people can rise to their own relief.

And the State debts? Sir, I should like to know by what right the subject of State debts is so frequently dragged into this Senate and the States are here chided and censured as if under our supervision. Who gives us jurisdiction over them? By what authority have we the right to say to Pennsylvania, or Illinois, or any other State, you are extravagant; you have got into debt; and we will leave you to get out as you can. Whence is this right? Who made it the duty of the Federal Government to give lectures to the States on getting into this debt? But those debts have been contracted, and, as the Senator from South Carolina says, one effect of it has been to enlarge our imports, because the means arising from the State bonds has been thrown into the channel of commerce. But it will be no longer so, for that very means will now become an obstruction to commerce. But those debts exist, and, as men of honor and honesty, those who owe them must pay them; and I trust no man here will be so destitute of honor and probity as to say they ought not to be paid. They have been contracted, and our States have received the benefit; and I trust and believe that not a State of this Union will be so lost to honor and good faith as not to pay such debts. The debts exist, and in the worst forms, because the foreigner is against us, not as a whole, but as divided into parts, as separate members of the Confederacy, on whom there is foreign debt, and consequently foreign influence.

And what is to be done? The States have here proposed nothing, in either branch of Congress. But we know the existence of these debts, and the distress which prevails in these different communities; and we know that taxation will be necessary. Some of the States, right or wrong, have contracted debts to an extent which the people cannot bear; and if we are not destitute of all those feelings which ought to belong to a parent Government, and which, as such, we should cherish, we ought deeply to sympathize with all these sufferings.

Well, and what suggestion did I make? Was it to assume these debts? No, sir; no, sir. But we are in possession of an important fund, which, of right, belongs to the States. The States have no power of imposing duties on imports for the purpose of relieving themselves. And what was my suggestion? The debts exist, and must be paid, principal and interest; and my suggestion was, that we should give up what belongs to the States, or, at least, do what we can for them, by imposing duties on articles purely of luxury, and give the States their own property, the proceeds of the public land, which would of itself be sufficient to pay the interest on a debt of $100,000,000, and I believe the whole amount of the State debts is not much more than $100,000,000. But I have been drawn into an exhibition of these views on an occasion when I had not intended it. I merely meant to make some suggestions appropriate on presenting a memorial. The Senator from South Carolina thought fit to express, what is not at all extraordinary, that there is a total difference of opinion between us on this subject. But he misstated me in regard to the tariff, and I therefore thought it my duty to say what I have done on that point, and I trust this will serve with the Senate as my apology.

Mr. CALHOUN. I will not enter into the argument, but merely say, by way of comment on the Senator's remarks, that his scheme in regard to the public lands, is one of the modifications for assuming the State debts; and, in my opinion, it is the most unconstitutional and ruinous that can be imagined. But I trust the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] will give us an opportunity soon to enter fully into that subject—(alluding to the expected report on Mr. BENTON's resolutions adverse to the assumption of debts by the States.) It is time to act; and, in my opinion, we are at the point where we were when the American System was adopted—the revival of which would be followed by incalculable injury. I am ready to meet that point, and to show that the whole system is the reverse of our true policy.

Mr. CLAY. The gentleman chooses to call this (the distribution of the land proceeds) an assumption of the State debts. Why, sir, the proposition was made long before any State was in debt, or, if any, only for a trifling sum; and the gentleman says this is an assumption of the State debts! But how? On what grounds did I make my proposition? We are in possession of a fund belonging to the States, held in trust solely for their benefit; and I said we ought now to distribute its proceeds among the States. And the gentleman says this is an assumption of the State debts! Sir, how is it so? And whose is this property? It will go to the States that owe no debt; and if those States receive it, they get only what they are entitled to.

In respect to the American System, I am ready to engage in the discussion on that subject; but when I do so, I hope the honorable Senator from South Carolina will remember the part he took in 1816 as the originator of that system; and that I was then his humble follower on that subject and for years afterwards; and I believe the country is now fifty years ahead of what it would have been but for that system; and if it had not been for that system, we should be now in the state we were before the Revolution, when there was no paper and no currency, except as tobacco and other articles of trade were used as a medium. I shall then be ready to show that domestic causes produce the greater portion of the distress in which the country is involved; but of foreign causes, the main one has been that we produce too little at home, and send for too much abroad; and I believe the imports are enlarged not merely by the want of duty on luxuries, but the list of free articles is more than a moiety of the whole imports of the country.

Mr. GRUNDY said, without intending to declare any opinion on the merits of the debate in which the gentlemen who preceded him had engaged, he expressed the hope that the subject of the assumption of State debts by the General Government would not be worn out before it came properly before the Senate. The Select Committee to which that matter had been referred, would in a few days make a report, in which all the questions connected with the subject would be presented, fully and fairly, for the action of the Senate, and every Senator would have an opportunity of presenting his sentiments on them.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Bickford P Hutchinson and others, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land or that they be allowed to locate other lands of equal value in lieu thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of the Cairo city and canal company, praying that the city of Cairo may be selected as the site of a national armory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Y also, presented a preamble and resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to use their exertions to procure the adoption of measures for the speedy and permanent adjustment of the title of the United States to the Oregon Territory; which were referred to the Select Committee on the Oregon Territory, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Y. also, presented the memorial of a number of the citizens of the State of Illinois and Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, praying an appropriation for improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petitions of John Quincey, Daniel Root, and John Paul, made an adverse report in each case, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. P. from the same committee, to which was referred the petitions on the subject, reported

A bill for the relief of Samuel Collins, and

A bill for the relief of Hannah Laighton;

Which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petitions of Ann Eliza Laurie and Irvine Shubrick, made an adverse report thereon, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to repeal certain acts respecting navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to navy pensions, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. W. said, as this was a public bill of much interest, he would ask the Senate to make it the special order for Tuesday next; which was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Nathaniel Jacobs, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD said that, at the last session of Congress, the petition of John Kurtz for remuneration for the loss of the cargo of the ship Allegany, was referred to the Committee on Claims. That committee had this petition under their consideration, and reported a bill for the relief of the petitioner. That bill was much debated in the Senate, and a vote was finally taken in the Senate equivalent (as regarded by the Committee of Claims) to a rejection of the bill. The committee, therefore, did not purpose again to consider this subject. The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee reported that they be discharged from its consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims. If he had been present at the time when this report was made from the Committee on the Judiciary, he should have objected to the reference of the subject to the Committee of Claims. That committee had done what it deemed to be its duty, and the Senate had overruled, after public debate, the decision of that committee; and, while he was at the head of the committee, he could not consent to lend his aid in bringing the same bill again before the Senate for its action. He, therefore, was instructed by the committee to return the papers again to the Senate, and he moved that they lie on the table.

The papers were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred

A bill to refund to Noah Miller and others, a part of the proceeds of the sale of the British sloop Mary and cargo; and

A bill for the relief of the Plumb Island Bridge and Turnpike Company; reported the same without amendment.

Mr. K. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of an extension of credit to the State of Illinois on certain duty bonds, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions inquire into the expediency of allowing a pension to James T. Clelladon, from 1815 to 1830, when his present pension commenced.

The resolution submitted yesterday in relation to the North-eastern boundary coming up for consideration,

Mr. RUGGLES offered an amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was not opposed to the amendment, but as it related to a delicate subject, he would suggest that the whole subject lay over till to-morrow; which was agreed to.

The following bills were read the third time and passed:

A bill to refund the money paid, and to cancel the bonds given, to secure duties upon vessels and their cargoes employed in the whale fishery;

A bill for the relief of John McCarty; and

A bill for the relief of A. G. S. Wight.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the collection, safe keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public money.

Mr. BENTON proposed to amend the bill by striking out from the 19th and 20th sections the words, "or in such notes, bills, or paper issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed to be received by law in payment of the public dues."

Mr. B. proceeded at length to explain and enforce the propriety of the amendment, and was followed by Messrs. WRIGHT, CALHOUN, NORVELL, WALKER, CLAY, of Kentucky, HENDERSON, and ALLEN; when the question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted—ayes 33, noes 6.

Mr. WALKER then submitted an amendment, striking out that part of section 13 empowering the agents of the Government to contract for the use of the vaults of banks; which, after some remarks from Mr. W. and Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, was agreed to without a division.

The bill was then informally passed over, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; after which,

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, 1840.

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, being entitled to the floor,

Mr. MITCHELL, with the permission of the gentleman from Georgia, begged leave of the House to make a brief explanation, in answer to an article that appeared in one of the papers of this city. In consequence of the course pursued by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] the other day in alluding to an article that appeared in the Madisonian, having a personal bearing on himself, he Mr. M., was constrained to ask the same indulgence in reference to himself. The article he alluded to appeared in the Globe of of this city, of Tuesday last. Mr. M. then read from the Globe as follows:

"It is true that General Duff Green was offered ten thousand dollars if, by the use of his name, a few of the State Rights party could be induced to join the Federal party and secure his election as public Printer, provided he would surrender the employment so obtained to Gales and Seaton. This proposition was made to General Green directly, by Mr. MITCHELL, a member from New York, in a letter. This letter was sent by General Green to a member of the House from North Carolina, with a view that it might be shown to some one of the State Rights party of South Carolina. It was shown by him, as it ought to have been, first to the SPEAKER, and with his advice, to another gentleman of distinction. All considered it a gross overture of bribery. The member who made this proposition, although he used in his letter the term "ice" in making it, and gave assurance that, if "adroitly managed," the whole Federal vote could be concentrated on General Green for the purpose named, yet disclaimed speaking for his party. If we misstate, in the slightest particular, the purport of the letter, Mr. MITCHELL can put all right by producing it.

"The public have, in this simple statement, the history of the $10,000 proposition to purchase the public printing, which has been so falsely imputed to us by the confederate of Messrs. Gales and Seaton, in the corrupt transaction of the extra session of 1837."

Mr. M. said it was proper that he should remark, that, previous to the publication of this article, he received intimations of the character named in it; and, for the purpose of putting himself right before the House, he wrote to General Green for a copy of the letter which he had written to him, and which was written in too much haste to retain a copy of it. He wrote to General Green for a copy of this letter for the purpose of laying it before the House; but, having waited for four days without hearing from General Green, he was constrained to make this explanation to the House without it. This article in the Globe, so far as it conveyed the idea that he made the proposition contained in his letter for the purpose of bribery, was entirely false. He merely wrote this letter to Gen. Green, sugges ing to him to come here and be the candidate for the office of Printer of the House, without making him the offer of any specific sum for the use of his name. He told him that he was most anxious to defeat the election of Blair and Rives; and believing it impossible to elect Gales and Seaton, he advised h m to come on and be a candidate, as it was probable he could be elected. He ad led, that if he was unable, from the want of means, to execute the printing of the House, he could make an arrangement with Gales and Seaton to do it. Mr. MITCHELL said he thought this proposition to Green was no more a matter of bribery than was the election, by the Whigs, of a Sub-Treasury candidate for the office of Speaker. He made this proposition on his own responsibility, and it was due to Messrs. Gales and Seaton to say that he did so without any consultation whatever with them. What construction others might make on the part he had acted, he did not know, but he was sure that no one who was not capable of committing bribery himself, would consider that letter as a proffer of bribery. He had not yet obtained a copy of his letter to General Green, but when he did so, he would lay it before the House. The article in the Globe said that his letter was shown first to the SPEAKER, as it ought to have been, and he would call the SPEAKER'S attention to the idea here attempted to be conveyed. Was it meant that it ought first to have been shown to the SPEAKER, for the purpose of his laying it before the House? The article further said, that by all it was considered as an offer bribery. He did not know if the SPEAKER so considered it; but——

The SPEAKER said he knew nothing of the article in the Globe, to which the gentleman referred, till he saw it in print. He never expressed the opinion that the letter shown to him was an offer of bribery—but he said at once that the proposition was inadmissible.

Mr. FISHER, of North Carolina, presumed that it was understood by every gentleman present that he was the member from North Carolina to whom allusion was made in the article in the Globe. This rendered it necessary that some explanation should come from him, in relation to the part he had in the matter, though he regretted that his name should have been connected with it in any way. He had no ambition to figure in matters of this kind, and it was for this reason that he had not spoken of it. The simplest way to explain a subject of this nature was to tell the whole story; and he would do so with as much brevity as possible.

About the time that Congress met, he received a letter from General Green, informing him that he was a candidate for the office of printer to the House, and could be elected. Taking this to be a circular letter, common on such occasions, he laid the letter aside, and took no further notice of it; and a few days after he saw General Green, who said nothing on the subject. But a day or so after the SPEAKER was elected, he, Mr. F. received another letter from General Green, enclosing this letter of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MITCHELL.] The statement in the Globe, just read, was made from an explanation of his, [Mr. FISHER'S,] and on his authority; and after it was written out, had been shown to him. The Editors of the Globe had been accused of having committed the same act that was proposed in the letter of the gentleman from New York, and having heard of this matter, they called on him for the purpose of obtaining information respecting it, which he, [Mr. F.] felt that it was but sheer justice that he should give them.

Now, sir, said Mr F. for the contents of the letter. He would endeavor to give them according to the best of his recollection. The letter begins by saying "that it is pretty well ascertained that Gales and Seaton could not be elected, and that the writer's aversion to Blair was so great, that he wished Gen. Green to come on and be a candidate, believing that if he could get a few of his friends to vote for him, he could be elected; that the printing would be worth about $30.000, and as Gen. Green probably had not the means of executing it, he could make an arrangement with Gales and Seaton to do it for him—he retaining $10,000, without any risk or responsibility whatever, and Gales and Seaton receiving the remaining $20.000 for doing the work and incurring the trouble and responsibility." This letter Gen. Green enclosed to him, (Mr. F.) desiring him to confer with certain gentlemen on the subject, without naming them, but by the allusions made, he could not but understand who General Green meant. He at once, Mr. F. said, saw the impropriety of the proposition, and you, sir, [addressing the SPEAKER] being the first gentleman I met of those for whom I thought the letter might be intended, may remember that I said to you that I had received a letter of a very strange character; and, showing it to you, asked if I should show it to the gentlemen referred to. You remarked, sir, that the proposition could not be entertained for a moment, but you said nothing, as you have just very correctly observed, about bribery. You thought that I ought to exhibit the letter to some of the gentlemen referred to in Gen. Green's letter.

After I had left you, I met with another gentleman—a distinguished member of the other House—to whom I offered to show the letter, explaining its contents. He declined reading it, and denounced the proposition in the strongest terms as an overture of bribery. Here was the mistake made in the article in the Globe. It was the last named gentleman who denounced the letter as an overture of bribery, and not another person, as is there inferred, though you and myself before had expressed our disapprobation. I then determined to return the letter to General Green, and get rid of the subject altogether. But for my own safety, I showed it to a gentleman from South Carolina, who was my fellow-lodger. Shortly afterwards, Gen. Green came in, when I was rejoiced at having an opportunity of getting rid of the subject. General Green referred to the subje t briefly, and, after a very few words of explanation, he asked for the letters, and I placed them in his hands. There was another error in the Globe, which Mr. F. said he would take occasion to correct. It was probable that it might be supposed, from the Globe, that this statement was made with the knowledge of the SPEAKER. This was a mistake. The SPEAKER had no knowledge whatever of the statement being made. Whether the gentleman from New York is right in considering the proposition no more a matter of bribery than the election of the Speaker by Whig votes, he would not pretend to say. The subject was before the House, and every man might draw his own conclusions.

Mr. HOLMES observed that it was due to the gentleman who had just made a statement, [Mr. FISHER,] that he should corroborate every word he had stated. The gentleman had submitted the letter referred to, to him. He read it; and his recollections assured him that there was not one word that the gentleman had stated to be in it but what was correct. When it was shown to him, he (Mr. H.) had expressed no indignation or surprise, because he had heard that this was one of the most corrupt bodies on earth, and therefore, hearing a letter read coming from a member of such a body, said he was prepared to expect some corruption; but was not yet fully innoculated in the manner of conducting such affairs. The very boldness of such a proposition drove the mind "from its propriety." [This Mr. HOLMES uttered in a satirical vein.]

Mr. MITCHELL said he would undertake to say that, although all that the gentleman from North Carolina had said was in the letter might be true, he had not stated one quarter of what was in it. Also, it seemed to him that the gentleman had confounded his (Mr. M's) letter to Gen. Green with the G neral's letter to him, [Mr. F.] If Gen. Green offered to bribe Gales and Seaton, he (Mr. M.) did not offer to bribe either of them. There was no proffer of bribery in the case. He had merely suggested to General Green the basis of an agreement he might make with Gales and Seaton. If any one looked upon it as a proffer of bribery, he had a very poor idea of what bribery was. He, however, expected to get a copy of the letter from Gen. Green; and, when he did so, he would lay it before the House, when every gentleman could judge of its purport for himself.

Mr. FISHER said, a single word more. It will be recollected that I made no charge that the proposition was a case of bribery; but I do say, if there was any thing like bribery in it, it was not to be found in General Green, but in the letter of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MITCHELL.] It was possible that he (Mr. FISHER) had not stated all that was in the letter, but I have stated distinctly what I recollected of it and what, I believe, was the most material parts.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, did he not say, in the letter, that I did not wish General Green to come on here, and make any arrangement that public opinion would not bear him out in?

Mr. FISHER said, it was very possible it might be in the letter; he did not distinctly recollect it; but as the gentleman had said so, he presumed it was.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, being the report of the committee on the rules, and the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina to amend the rules by the addition of the following:

"That upon the presentation of any memorial or petition, praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate, or further action thereon."

Mr. COOPER of Georgia, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at great length, and with much force and ability, in explanation of the views he took of the subject, and of the votes he should feel it his duty to give. His speech he said was not intended for his constituents, whom he preferred addressing face to face, but to that House, and to the constituents of the gentlemen who presented Abolition petitions. It was to them he addressed himself, calling on them to relieve this House and the country from excitement and agitation, which the presentation and discussion of these petitions lead to. It was his wish to disembarrass this question of all party considerations. He desired to know what course the Congress of the United States would take with regard to a matter of such deep and vital interest, and he was content to sit with folded arms, resolving to make no motion whatever, until he saw what that course would be. He regretted exceedingly that any proposition for the disposition of this subject had come from a member from the South, and particularly regretted the proposition of his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] He wished the question settled under a proposition from another quarter. If his advice could be taken, he would say to that gentleman, take back your resolution, and let those who bring forward abolition petitions make such motions with regard to them as they think the House would sustain. He wished the gentlemen here, who must see the danger to the Union, as well as the injury to the slave-holding States that these petitions were causing, would address themselves at home to their constituents—go to them in their towns, their fields, and their villages, and tell them that they are tampering with the peace and happiness of the South; that they are endangering the Union, and that Congress has no right under the Constitution to meddle with this subject, and prevail on them to pause in their thoughtless career. Mr. C. said that unless these petitions were put an end to in this or some other way by the House, the State of Georgia must act for herself, and resort to means within her power, to put an end to them. The argument of Mr. C. is too long for even a synopsis in this evening's paper, but will be given to our readers as soon as prepared.

Mr. BIDDLE, after proceeding at some length in reply to Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, said, all that the Representatives from the North wished was, that the South would take out of the mouth of the Abolitionists the answer which they were afforded by the action of the House on their petitions - take that away, and they of the North would put down Abolition. Take away the false issue made there, the difficulty which disarms them—remove that difficulty, and all danger would be at an end. In his remarks he had no anxiety to operate on the constituency either in the North or the South, but with perfect simplicity of purpose, give his views as to the best course for the House to pursue. He was thankful the House had pursued a course which permitted gentlemen to explain themselves and define their position, which the mere yeas and nays did not show. He felt that his position, fortunately, was one which enabled him to approach this subject with perfect freedom. He took the ground at home, in reply to Abolitionists, that it was inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitions, and unwarrantable for them to interfere in the questions at all. For his part, though he had been represented as an Abolitionist, he would no sooner abolish slavery at the South, than he would vote to re-establish slavery in Philadelphia; he was not even disposed to take it up as a question of power, vested in that body. At home, during the canvass, he had challenged his competitor to express his opinions on this subject; but he observed perfect silence on the great question involving the peace of the country; he could not be drawn forth. It was anticipated that he could be defeated by that gentleman, because of his silence on that subject, and the bold stand that he (Mr. BIDDLE) had taken in defense of the rights of the States under the Constitution.

Mr. B. said he had come there with great dislike to the course of the petitioners; and although impressed with such feelings, he had, from the course of that House, and the denunciations which gentlemen heaped upon them, almost at times wished himself a rank Abolitionist, that he might reply to such denunciations in the spirit of one. The whole object of these petitioners, he said, was confined to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and the question was whether their petitions made a reasonable request. Mr. Van Buren, he said, had taken the ground himself that Congress had the right to legislate as much on this subject as any other for the District, and to the same extent that the States of Maryland and Virginia had previous to the cession. The South, too, had elected him in the face of these opinions, and consequently ratified them.

Mr. VANDERPOEL here interrupted Mr. BIDDLE, by asking him if Mr. Van Buren did not also say that, notwithstanding this power existed, he considered the exercise of it so dangerous to the stability of the Union—so inexpedient—that he would veto any bill that should be passed by Congress for such purpose.

Mr. BIDDLE replied, did not every gentleman on that floor who presented Abolition petitions say the same thing; but the question was as to the sincerity of the profession.

If it was a question of expediency merely, with whom did the power rest to decide it? Certainly with Congress—the subject was at the mercy of Congress, and consequently at the mercy of public opinion—not of one State, but of the whole United States; and hence it was of the utmost importance that they should not disregard it. If the object of the petitioners was a matter within the scope of legislative action, why could they pretend to treat those petitioners differently from other citizens who petition on any other subject. If we treat them differently merely because we entertain a theory of expediency, what was there to prevent them from treating petitions on any other subject in the same way? The pre-emption law might become transiently obnoxious—petitions might be sent in upon that subject, and they could, with equal propriety, spurn them from the halls of Congress, as petitions upon the subject of slavery.

This was a matter which public opinion at last must decide, and he thought the course of that House was the maddest that could be adopted to allay the excitement upon this question, and to gain a correct public opinion. By the course pursued by Congress, the Abolitionists have been sent forth to the country as apostles of a great principle; but on the other hand, if you receive these petitions, you would place in the hands of the Representatives from the North a banner most precious to a free people under which to do battle. If gentlemen would go into the harvest field at the North they would not find these petitioners a dishonest, ignorant people. If they be told, as they have been told, that the prayers of the petitioners cannot be granted without endangering the Union, and was inexpedient, they would reply, why has not Congress told us so—why has it not pointed out to us the unreasonableness of our requests. It was an honest feeling with these petitioners; but they look upon the course of Congress as an act of despotism; there is something wrong, they think, in dodging the question. Mr. B. said, you give currency and triumph to these petitioners when you treat them as if there was something which could not be exposed to the light of open day. If this be a subject which it is believed inexpedient to legislate upon, he thought it proper for Congress to make such a report to them as would enlighten them, and thus put an end to the agitation of the question forever.

Mr. WATTERSON was opposed to the reception of Abolition petitions in any form whatever. He would neither receive them, read them, nor refer them to a committee. He did not consider the right of petition at all invaded by refusing to receive them, because the Abolitionists petitioned about a matter which did concern them—they having no grievances to redress—and a matter about which Congress had no power to legislate. He hoped the Representatives from the slave holding States would stand firm, and not yield an inch, for they must be well aware that the rankest of the Abolitionists only expected to accomplish their objects by degrees. Let them first establish the right to have their petitions received and read, and the next thing they would do, would be to prescribe the mode of action on them. Mr. W. replied to the remarks of Mr. MONROE and Mr. GRANGER the other day with regard to the right of petition, and noticed the remark that the battle of Abolitionism must be fought at the North. Mr. W. showed the connection at this time existing between the Abolitionists and the Whig parties, and asked if it was fighting the battles of the South that the Whigs had elected a thorough going Abolitionist as Governor of New York. He asked if it was fighting the battles of the South when the Whigs at the Harrisburg Convention nominated for the Presidency a gentleman (Gen. Harrison) who was in favor of appropriating the surplus revenue to the purposes of emancipation. Mr. W. referred to the resolutions of Mr. ATHERTON of last session, which were introduced for the purpose of preventing the evils growing out of the presentation of Abolition petitions, and said that of the 52 votes that were given against it 48 of them were Whigs. Mr. W's remarks will be given hereafter.

Mr. STANLY replied at great length to the remarks of Mr. WATTERSON, of Tennessee. He reviewed the course of the two great contending parties at previous sessions of Congress upon the subject of Abolition petitions, and explained his previous votes upon the propositions introduced, with reference to the disposition of them, and disclaimed any connection with Abolition. He thought the question itself, and the votes of members on that floor on the question, had been used to effect party purposes. He then read the written opinions of some of the friends of the Administration on that floor expressed at home, and published in the newspapers of the day, for the purpose of identifying them with the cause of Abolition, which drew from them disclaimers. He particularly referred to a publication of Mr. PARMENTER, of Massachusetts, which he thought committed him to that cause.

Mr. PARMENTER did not know if he understood precisely what the gentleman from North Carolina meant by an Abolitionist. I should like to hear him refer to any remark or writing of mine on that subject, or to any vote I have given, other than for the reference to a committee.

Mr. STANLY said he should like to know what the gentleman himself considered an Abolitionist, and read a letter written by Mr. PARMENTER, in which he gave his opinions on the subject of abolition.

Mr. PARMENTER said that, in the State of Massachusetts, it was essential to the quality of an Abolitionist that he should wish Congress immediately to adopt measures to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories, without any regard to the consequences. It was true that he, in common with a very large portion of the people of Massachusetts, believed slavery to be a very great evil; and would be glad if it could be abolished without disturbing the peace and harmony of the Union, or violating the rights of others. Mr. P. added that the letter read by the gentleman from North Carolina, was not considered to be in accordance with the views of the Abolitionists, and accordingly they all voted in a body against him.

Mr. STANLY went on with his remarks, and spoke of a number of distinguished members of the Democratic party whom he stigmatized as Abolitionists. Mr. S. read some extracts from an address of Mr. Morton, whose recent election as Governor of Massachusetts, the Democratic party hailed as a triumph, to show that he also was an Abolitionist.

Mr. PARMENTER wished to make one remark in relation to Mr. Morton, the Governor elect of Massachusetts. The gentleman had read some extracts where Gov. Morton spoke his sentiments very strongly against slavery. But the gentleman did not draw the distinction between anti-slavery and Abolitionism. The one was a mere matter of belief, while the other was an intention to carry its objects into effect without any regard to the consequences. He would make another remark. The Abolition paper printed at Boston opposed the election of Governor Morton, and recommended it to the Abolitionists to support another candidate. Mr. P. wished the gentleman would define his ideas of Abolition more distinctly.

Mr. STANLY said he wished the gentleman would define his.

Mr. PARMENTER said he would define what he considered to be the views of an Abolitionist. It was a desire that Congress should abolish slavery in this District, and in the Territories, without regard to the rights of others, the peace and tranquillity of a large portion of the country, and the safety of the Union.

After some further remarks from Mr. STANLY, in which he was two or three times corrected by Mr. WELLER,

Mr. BOTTS obtained the floor, and explained his vote a few days ago on questions connected with this subject. He was understood to be opposed to the course the House had heretofore pursued on this subject, and the plan proposed to be pursued by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] He thought the petitions ought to be treated with some respect—that they ought to be received. He believed that the excitement on this question had been kept alive for political purposes; and that the course of gentlemen on that floor had connected the subject of Abolition with the right of petition; and thereby advanced the prospects of the Abolitionists. It was a subject upon which, as a Southern man, he did not intend to become excited. He would look upon it with composure, until his constitutional rights of property should be attempted to be violated, and then he would defend it to the utmost of his abilities. At the present aspect of the question, he thought Southern gentlemen should pursue a more liberal course than formerly; and he should not feel at liberty to break off from them if they wished to pursue such a course. He thought it only wanted a proper vote of that House to crush Abolitionism forever. As much as had been said by gentlemen of the infection of that body with its principles, he did not believe that there were twenty in both parties, but thought there were as many on one side as the other. If there were more, he desired to know it, both for himself and his constituents; and it was for that reason he wanted such a vote by the House as would indicate it.

At the suggestion of Mr. HOFFMAN, previously made,

Mr. BOTTS moved that the rules, as amended, be adopted for one week from that day; which motion was agreed to; when

On motion of Mr. COLQUITT,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 17, 1840.

Mr. CUTHBERT appeared in his seat to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT presented three petitions, signed by a number of citizens of the State of New York, severally praying the establishment of a port of entry and collection district at Coldspring, on Long Island, in said State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of Luke Woodbury and others, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, ordered, that the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, in favor of the survey of the lands in that Territory, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and that they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING submitted additional documents in relation to the petition of Jubal B. Hancock; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill for the protection of emigrant and other Indians west of Arkansas.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents, to which had been referred the petitions and memorials of Stephen McCormic, F. A. Chevalier De Geerston, and Chauncey Hall, severally asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred,

A bill for the relief of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone, and

A bill for the relief of Hazard Knowles; reported the same without amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petition of James Williams, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize registers and receivers to administer oaths required to be taken by purchasers of public land; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. C. also, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the pre-emption act of 19th June, 1834; and

A bill for the relief of Sutton Stephens;

Which were severally read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

THE MAINE BOUNDARY.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, in accordance with his promise on yesterday, the Senate took up the resolutions offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, calling on the President of the United States for the correspondence, not already communicated, with the British Government, on the subject of the Maine Boundary, and with the British Minister and the Governor of Maine relative to the invasion of the State of Maine, and the exercise of jurisdiction in the disputed territory.

The question being on the following additional resolution, offered by Mr. RUGGLES:

Resolved further, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, so far as may not be incompatible with the public interest, whether any, and, if any, what measures have been taken, under the act of Congress of March, 1839, or otherwise, to cause the removal or expulsion of the British troops which have taken possession of a portion of the territory of Maine claimed by Great Britain; and especially whether, since the last session of Congress, any military posts have been established in Maine, or any other military measures adopted, preparatory to a just vindication of the honor and rights of the nation and of Maine, as connected with the persevering claim made by Great Britain to a portion of the territory of that State.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he scarcely knew what to say on the subject of this resolution. It would seem to contain an implied censure upon the President, which, in his humble opinion, was wholly unfounded. In regard to the course pursued by that distinguished officer in this very important and delicate matter, there was but one sentiment in this country, and all political parties had evinced their approbation of it. But the resolution of the Senator [Mr. RUGGLES] called upon him to communicate to the Senate whether any and what measures have been taken under the act of March, 1839, or otherwise, to expel the British troops from the disputed territory; and whether, since the last session, any military posts have been established in Maine preparatory to a just vindication of the nation's honor. Now, (said Mr. B.) every Senator knows perfectly well the only answer which the President can give to these interrogatories. Indeed, this answer has been substantially given in advance. In his annual message, dated on the second December last, he has informed us that he had not touched a dollar of the $10,000,000 confided to him by the act of March, 1839; and he then surrendered up the trust which had been confided to him by Congress. And why did he pursue this course? Simply because the contingency had not happened upon which he could have applied this money. There had been no invasion of our territory, or any imminent danger of such an invasion. There had been no attempt on the part of Great Britain to enforce by arms her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory. So far from it, that a solemn agreement had been entered into with the British authorities for the express purpose of preventing any such attempt from being made by either nation. It was not until about the first of January that the President could possibly have heard that two companies of British troops had been stationed at the Temiscouata lake, because the letter of Governor Fairfield, communicating this information, was not dated until the 23d of December. And yet the Senate are gravely called upon to adopt a resolution, asking the President whether he has taken any measures, under the act of March, 1839, to expel these troops—in the very face of his message of the 2d December last, declaring that he had not found it necessary to use any of the powers conferred upon him by this act. Nay, more. If the President had established military posts in the disputed territory, his conduct would have been justly censurable, and would have afforded to the British Government the same cause of offence as they have afforded to us, unless it should be satisfactorily explained, in recently stationing troops at the Temiscouata lake. The President's answer to these inquiries, we all know, must be in the negative; and it would, therefore, seem that the object was to cast an implied though a very unjust censure upon him for having done nothing.

Mr. B. said he did not know what course the President had pursued since the receipt of Governor Fairfield's letter. He presumed, however, that, as a matter of course, he had protested against this military occupation of the disputed territory by the British authorities as a violation of the subsisting agreement and of the rights of Maine, and had asked an explanation from the British Minister. Before he attempted to expel these troops by force, he must call upon Congress to furnish him the means. Indeed, we as yet know nothing of the particular circumstances attending this military occupation, except what is contained in the letter of Governor Fairfield; he should, therefore, be glad if the Senator from Maine would withdraw his resolution; but, if he did not, Mr. B. would not object to its passage. All the information which it was in the President's power to communicate would be elicited, if it could at this time be properly communicated by the two resolutions of the Senator's colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. B. said that, on the question of the Northeastern boundary, the conduct of the President had hitherto been so fortunate as to satisfy even his political opponents. It had combined prudence with firmness, and had received the approbation of almost every reflecting man in the country. The negotiation on this important question was, if he might be permitted to use the expression, now at its very crisis; and the President had deemed it inexpedient to communicate to Congress any of the correspondence which had taken place between the two Governments since the close of the last session, doubtless because he deemed that it might have an injurious effect upon the negotiation. Judging by the past, (said Mr. B.) surely we ought to have sufficient confidence in the President to wait for a short period, and not be calling upon him for communications which may be injurious to the public interest, and which, if so, ought to be withheld. The final result of the negotiation will probably soon be known; and will then, as a matter of course, be submitted to Congress, with all the correspondence.

Allow me, said Mr. B. to make one general remark before I take my seat. I am very apprehensive that we may have serious difficulties with the British authorities before the close of this controversy. My earnest desire is, therefore, that our proceedings may be marked with such justice, moderation, and firmness as to justify us in the eyes of all mankind. A contest must be avoided, if this be possible consistently with national honor; and then, if it should be forced upon us, we shall be a united people.

He made these remarks without any knowledge upon the subject other than that in the possession of every Senator.

Mr. RUGGLES said he concurred fully in the resolutions of his colleague, asking for copies of correspondence. But Mr. R's amendment went further, and asked information as to what had been done—not merely what had been said, but what had been done by the President; and Mr. R. would be glad to know what had been done under the act of 1839, or by any other authority. He had not been aware that his amendment could be construed into any disrespect or censure of the President: certainly it was not intended. It was a simple inquiry; and if the President had not done what he ought, Mr. R. would leave that matter to be decided by the State which he represented. Mr. R. also believed that the President might have done something since the second of December, under some authority, which he had not yet made known, and which it was worth while to know. He at least might have taken some precautionary measures, such, at least, as making surveys, for it was to be presumed that the President had his eye on what was known to the public, especially as he could not but have apprehended the risk of difficulty as well as the Senator from Pennsylvania and Mr. R. himself.

They had learned from the President himself, that commissioners had been appointed to make a survey of the country, and report, not to this, but to the British Government. And what had that commission done? They had gone up the St. John's river, crossing the line on their way to the west, to the head waters of the St. John's, which were contiguous to those of the Aroostook; and they had then gone down the Aroostook, and had entirely avoided that section of country which was designated by the treaty of 1783, and where the highlands were to be found as pointed out by the treaty. And now Mr. R. would ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he believed for a moment that all this was for the purpose of ascertaining the facts in regard to the treaty? It had, on the contrary, been apprehended that thus, under cover of the treaty, it was for the purpose of seeking out military posts, and not of finding those marks and monuments which the treaty designated. This suspicion might be unfounded; but the apprehension itself which the Senator from Pennsylvania had expressed, seemed to warrant this inference of the people of Maine in reference to this survey. They had surveyed the rivers, and not the highlands; and this went to warrant the inference that the object of the survey was to get information for the Government of Britain that might be useful to them in case of the event which the Senator apprehended. And if such was their object, was it not proper to ask the President whether he had taken any precautionary measures, at least so far as to make a similar examination, especially as there was not a question in Congress or the country as to the right of Maine to the territory in dispute.

Mr. R. said further, that there had been a palpable and admitted violation of the arrangement entered into by the mediation of General Scott, of which the President could not but have been aware; and, in respect to caution, there had been abundance of that. The British Government had been cautious enough never to have a minister here with power to adjust the controversy; here, and here only, where the adjustment ought to have been made. They had now been cautious enough to send on this singularly conducted commission one of the ablest engineers of England, as if for the very purpose of a military survey. Mr. R. hoped, therefore, the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. ALLEN admitted the delicacy of this matter; but, delicate as it was, Congress, the Executive, and the whole American people were united as one man on the merits of this great question, and in according the right over the disputed territory to the State of Maine. Mr. A. ardently desired that this unanimity might be disturbed by nothing even doubtful or ambiguous; and if this resolution were doubtful in its character, he thought it ought to be so modified as to remove all ambiguity.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would cautiously avoid, on this occasion, any debate on the general subject. His opinions were sufficiently well known to render this unnecessary. There were three resolutions before the Senate for consideration; two of them, which he thought entirely proper, called on the President for all the correspondence between the British Minister and the Governor of Maine, the British Government and our own Government, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, which have not heretofore been communicated, provided its publication may not be deemed incompatible with the public interest. We have just heard, almost this instant, that British troops have occupied a portion of the disputed territory. The Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] ever true to his trust, offers a resolution, calling upon the President for all the information in his possession, the publication of which he might not deem improper. All this was very proper; but what did the resolution of the other Senator [Mr. RUGGLES] propose? Why, that [reads the resolution.]

Now, sir, what is the character of this resolution? And, mark me, sir, I do not oppose its passage, but I will make a single remark. Suppose the President had established military posts in the disputed territory, as this resolution intimates he ought to have done, would it not have been a direct violation of the agreement concluded between General Scott and Sir John Harvey? Had the President acted in this manner, he would have violated the spirit, as the British, if our late information should prove to be correct, had done both the letter and spirit of this agreement. The agreement had procured us peace on the border, and, in my opinion, should not have been lightly disturbed. The President is asked what he has done under the act of March, 1839, when the President has expressly informed us that he has done nothing, because the contingency contemplated in that act had not occurred at the date of his message. The negotiation was then proceeding amicably, as the President had informed us, and he hoped it might progress in the same spirit until it reached a peaceful termination.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said it always gave him great pleasure to concur, when he could, in the views of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. But he must now differ from him so far as to think that there was not the slightest imputation on the President in this resolution; and the Senator himself seemed to admit as much when he said he should make no objection to its adoption. And further, the mover of the resolution had himself declared that he had no purpose whatever of censure. That Senator was deeply interested in this matter, and was even laudably desirous to know all that could be known about it consistent with the public interest. And to what had we come, if the President was to be asked no question in regard to his official duties? And was there nothing to be allowed to a State whose rights had been so long withheld? Sir, (said Mr. C.) while we guard the President, let us not be insensible to the feelings and just rights of a member of this Confederacy. On this subject he saw no occasion to censure the President, but God knows he is sufficiently amenable to censure without going out of the way to find it. Sir, I think there is no imputation in the resolution, and I hope it will be allowed to be passed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he felt so much confidence in the Senate's ability to construe the meaning of language correctly, and was so much pleased with the approbation he had expressed of the President's conduct in regard to the Maine boundary controversy, that he was willing to forego his own opinion of the character of this resolution. It was true that this approbation had been accompanied by a protestation that the President was sufficiently censurable on other questions. As to the Senator's "God knows," &c. when he brings forward his bill of particulars, Mr. B. trusted that the friends of the President would be able to defend him triumphantly. At present Mr. B. was content with the admission in favor of the President's conduct respecting the Maine controversy, and he would now vote with more cheerfulness for the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS said he had listened yesterday and to day to the idea that this resolution implied censure on the President; but it had never entered his mind at all; and as to adopting the resolution, or an equivalent, there could be no doubt. The sentiment throughout Congress and the country was unanimous in favor of the right of Maine; and what the President in his late message had said was, we all felt deeply to be true, that the controversy had continued too long. It was full time for it to be brought to a close. And who knew what might be the present state of facts! At the last session, such was the excitement in the public mind, that when the British were about to take possession of this territory, there was great indignation manifested here and generally. Maine thought it her duty to repel that invasion. And how was the difficulty adjusted? By the mediation of General Scott, sent by this Government, between Maine and New Brunswick. There was now intelligence, very nearly official, that the territory was in the occupation of British troops, to remain there through the winter; and there was even an admission by the Governer of New Brunswick that the agreement then entered into had been violated. And what was the explanation of the Governor? That it had been done, not by his authority, but by one still higher, viz: that of the Governor General of Canada. Mr. D. thought there was every reason to be on the alert on this subject, and though he would violate no delicacy, he would not, on the other hand, forbear, till forbearance might well and justly be construed into tame submission. Very near, if not quite, to this point we had already gone, and he thought there was danger that the British Government might so construe it, and act accordingly. Mr. D. therefore insisted that this resolution, or something like it, ought to pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS said when he offered his resolution, he supposed it would bring all the correspondence, which the amendment proposed calling for, and he saw no obection to the resolution, and hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. ALLEN said he was entirely satisfied with the disclaimers of the mover, and other gentlemen of the Opposition, of any intended censure. With these disclaimers, he had no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The resolutions were then adopted.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of Florida overrun and infested by marauding bands of hostile Indians, reported the same with an amendment, the purport of which was to render the settlers under the provisions of the bill amenable to the laws of the Territory. The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the memorial and papers of John Kurtz, owner of the ship Allegany, were referred to a select committee.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL

Was then taken up and, after being discussed by Messrs. HENDERSON, WRIGHT, DAVIS, BUCHANAN, WALKER, and YOUNG, and the adoption of some unimportant amendments, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, White, and Young—18.

The Senate then adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 17, 1840.

Mr. MITCHELL asked the permission of the House to lay before it the letter to General Green, which had been referred to on yesterday. He had, since his remarks at that time, received a copy, which he read to the House, as follows:

WASHINGTON, December 18, 1839.

DEAR GENERAL: As we shall, in a few days, elect a Printer to the House for the Twenty-sixth Congress, it has occurred to me and other of my political friends, that such an arrangement could be made with you as would justify the entire Whig party in supporting you for that office. We neither expect or ask you to sacrifice a single principle which you profess, nor to do any act not justifiable to your conscience and to the world.

I am satisfied that Gales and Seaton cannot be elected; and that, if the contest has to come to a strife between them and Blair, the latter, in my opinion, will succeed.

Now, what had passed through my mind, was simply this: that you should, in the event of your election, offer Gales and Seaton to share equally with them, respectively, the profits of the office, after allowing them a fair compensation out, for their personal services; they to do all the work at their office, and you to be elected to the station.

The profits cannot be less for the whole Congress than $30,000; this would give you $10,000, you having no trouble or responsibility whatever. Now I suggest this on my own responsibility, but nevertheless, I hazard nothing in the conjecture, that if you are here and put in, the thing can be managed adroitly enough to ensure success. I have a strong desire to defeat Blair, and would be glad to do so in a way to oblige you personally. Write me by the receipt of this, and if you can, be in this city at the earliest possible moment. I direct this to Baltimore, and also, in duplicate, to Cumberland.

Truly, in haste,
Your obedient servant and friend,
CHAS. F. MITCHELL.

Gen. GREEN, Baltimore.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House can judge whether there is any thing in this letter to justify the charge of an attempt at bribery by me. It is simply a proposition for Gen. Green to become a candidate for public printer, and he to receive a proportion of the profits arising therefrom. He made no proposition to any party—to Green's personal friends, or to any one else. The suggestions were made by me merely as an inducement for him to become a candidate.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FISHER,] in stating the contents of the letter, to the best of his recollection, commenced by saying "that it is pretty well ascertained that Gales and Seaton could not be elected, and that the writer's aversion to Blair was so great, that he wished General Green to come on and be a candidate, believing that if he could get a few of his friends to vote for him, he could be elected; that the printing would be worth about $30,000, and as General Green probably had not the means of executing it, he could make an arrangement with Gales and Seaton to do it for him—he retaining $10,000, without any risk or responsibility whatever, and Gales and Seaton receiving the remaining $20 000 for doing the work and incurring the trouble and responsibility." Now, it was rather remarkable that that gentleman should remember what the letter did not contain, when he was stating that which it did contain. He did not state that I "did not wish General Green to do any thing not justifiable to his conscience and to the world." He thought the gentleman had a very peculiar memory, but he would, however, leave that to be settled by his own conscience.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HOLMES] shrunk from it, and was so astounded, that he could not sufficiently express his holy horror of the letter. That gentleman spoke of the propositions made to him. He had made no proposition to him. He had but written the single letter to General Green and none others. If there were other letters he thought they should be produced.

Mr. M. here made some remarks in defence of General Green, who, he said, had not acted in any way dishonorable in the transaction, and then read the following letter from that gentleman:

"DEAR SIR: I hand you a copy of your letter. I cannot withhold my surprise at the use that was made of it; but I cannot believe that Mr. FISHER or Mr. HUNTER have authorized the language in the Globe. I will give that attention to this matter which it requires at my hands. Your friend,

DUFF GREEN."

The SPEAKER, he said, had already disclaimed having authorized the language which characterized this letter as a case of bribery, in the statement published in the Globe. The gentleman from North Carolina also, in acknowledging that he gave permission to the editor of the Globe to publish the statement, disclaimed having stated to that editor, that either he or the SPEAKER had so characterized it as a case of "bribery," but that it was a third person, a gentleman not of this House. He cared not from what quarter that charge came, he pronounced it a falsehood, and he demanded that the author should be produced.

Mr. FISHER, who was absent at the time Mr. MITCHELL made his explanation, came in at a subsequent part of the proceedings, and, by permission, made the following remarks:

Mr. F. observed that since reaching his seat this morning, he had been informed that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MITCHELL] had, in his absence, made some additional remarks on the subject of his letter to General Green, and had introduced a copy of that letter. He had only to remark, that this was all proper enough, though it would have been as well if the original itself had been introduced. In the course of the gentleman's remarks, he understood that he had indulged himself in some reflections on his (Mr. F's) course, which he could not, at this time, take any notice of, for the reason that he had not heard them. He was absent in discharging the duties of the committee to which he belonged—the Committee of Elections. His object, Mr. F. said, in now asking the attention of the House, was, that the fact of his absence might be known, and go forth with the remarks of the gentleman; and to say that to-morrow, when the gentleman's remarks would be published, he would then be able to judge whether they were of a character to require his notice. If they should prove to be such, he would notice them; but if not, he would let them pass for what they might be worth. While up he would make another remark. The gentleman had alluded to the remarks of his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] and he would therefore take the occasion to say that that gentleman was also absent.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by general consent, reported from that committee the following bills:

A bill making appropriations for the support of Revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1840;

Also, a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for the fulfilment of the various treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes for the year 1840;

Which bills were twice read, and, on the motion of Mr. JONES, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr JONES also laid before the House a document from the Indian Department, giving a detailed statement of the estimates made by the Indian Department, to accompany the bill above reported; which was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER then announced the order of the day to be on the motion to reconsider the vote laying on the table the following resolution of Mr. COLES as an amendment to the rules.

"All petitions, memorials, and papers touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or transferring of slaves in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, shall, upon their presentation, be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, read, or referred, and no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Mr. GRAVES then moved a call of the House, which was agreed to, and the roll having been called over, 199 members answered to their names; and after the absentees had been called, some of whom coming in answered to their names,

Mr. HOPKINS moved that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. COLQUITT then submitted to the Chair that he having, out of courtesy, yesterday yielded the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, to enable him to make his motion, ought not to be debarred the privilege of expressing his views on the subject before the House; and

The SPEAKER having decided that the motion for reconsideration had precedence,

Mr. COLQUITT appealed from that decision.

Mr. BLACK asked if it would be in order for him to move to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table.

The SPEAKER replied that it would be in order for the gentleman to make such a motion, provided he could get the floor.

Mr. GRAVES said it was not his purpose to prevent gentlemen from expressing their views on this subject, and he would therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until three o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

Mr COLQUITT having withdrawn his appeal to make way for Mr. GRAVES's motion,

After some further remarks from Messrs. GRAVES, EVANS, and WILLIAMS of Kentucky, the last named gentleman renewed the appeal.

A debate on the appeal then ensued, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, EVERETT, CUSHING, WADDY THOMPSON, GRAVES, and LINCOLN, took part.

Mr. CRAIG called for the previous question, which, being seconded by the House, the main question was put, and the decision of the CHAIR was sustained—yeas 123, nays 72.

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to lay the question of reconsideration on the table; but withdrew the motion, when

Mr. GRAVES moved to postpone it, and make it the order of the day for to-morrow, at twelve o'clock; and after some further remarks from Messrs. BELL, GRAVES, TILLINGHAST, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina,

Mr. TILLINGHAST renewed his motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; when

Mr. GRAVES said, to relieve the House from embarrassment, and permit the discussion to go on, he would withdraw his motion for reconsideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, and Mr. VANDERPOEL submitted to the CHAIR whether, the House having divided on the question, it was competent for the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that the gentleman had a right to withdraw his motion.

Mr. COLQUITT, who was entitled to the floor, then addressed the House in an exceedingly eloquent speech of great length, in opposition to the reception of Abolition petitions, which will be laid before our readers as soon as written out.

Mr. SLADE then obtained the floor, and commenced an explanation of his views on the subject, and of the course he should take with regard to it, but after speaking a short time, yielded the floor to

Mr. VANDERPOEL, who moved that the House adjourn till Monday next; and, upon that,

Mr. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. VANDERPOEL, after the call had proceeded, said that, as it seemed to be the disposition of the House not to adjourn over, and as he wished to save time, he would, by permission, withdraw his motion; but, objection being made, the call was proceeded in, when it appeared that there were yeas 36, nays 142.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, asked the unanimous consent of the House for the purpose of moving a resolution. He said the order giving the CLERK the power to have the printing of the House executed had expired several days ago; and moved a resolution that the said order be extended for one week from Monday.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr JONES said, two bills had been this day reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, accompanied by some estimates, all of which it was important, for the action of the committee, and indispensable to facilitate the public business, should be printed.

Mr. GARLAND persisted in his objection; whereupon

Mr. JONES moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of introducing the resolution; but, before taking the question,

Mr. SLADE said he would be willing to yield the floor to the gentleman to make his motion, if, by universal consent, it could be carried; but, as objection was made, and proceedings might take place upon the proposition which would deprive him of the floor, he could not consent to yield it.

Mr. SLADE, however, gave way to a motion to adjourn; which, having failed, he was about resuming his remarks, when

Mr. GENTRY, by his permission, gave notice that he would, when in order, introduce a bill providing for the assumption of certain debts of the States, and appropriate the proceeds of the public lands for that purpose.

Mr. SLADE here made a motion that the House adjourn; and the yeas and nays having been ordered upon said motion, were—yeas 72, nays 65.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SLADE then made a motion to postpone the subject before the House until Monday 12 o'clock, and made the special order at that time.

Mr. R. GARLAND gave Mr. SLADE fair warning that if he could deprive that gentleman of the floor on that proposition on Monday, he would do so.

The question was then taken by tellers on the postponement, (Messrs. DROMGOOLE and DAVIES, of Pennsylvania, acting as such,) when it appeared that there were—ayes 106, noes 21.

Mr. J. W. JONES again renewed his proposition to extend the power of the CLERK to provide a suitable person to execute the necessary printing until Monday week next. He said it was indispensably necessary to have the printing executed by some person.

Objection being again made to the introduction of the resolution,

Mr. JONES moved to suspend the rules for that purpose; but before taking the question,

Mr. STANLY moved an adjournment, and the yeas and nays having been ordered upon the same, he withdrew his motion.

The question then recurred on the motion to suspend the rules, and on that

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 102, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, J. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Black, Botts, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O Butler, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Crockett, Cushing, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doberry, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Edwards, Ely, Floyd, Fornance, James Garland, Gerry, Graham, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Henry, John Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jas. Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lee, Leonard, Lucas, McCeilan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Petrikin, Ramsey, Rayner, Reynolds, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Slade, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Brockway, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, James Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Davies, Garret Davis, Dennis, Evans, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Granger, Graves, Green, Habersham, Wm. S. Hastings, John Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Holmes, James, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Keim, Kempshall, Lawrence, Marvin Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Simonton, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliferro, Toland, Triplett Trumbull, Wagner, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—67.

So the rules were not suspended, a vote of two-thirds being necessary for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS here gave notice that he would, on the first opportunity afforded, ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States, and to repeal certain acts re ating to such debtors.

On motion,

The House then adjourned till to morrow morning 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, January 18, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced to the House that the subject before it was the special order, being the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, to amend the rules by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition, praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate, or further action thereon.

Mr. SLADE, who was entitled to the floor upon this subject, was proceeding, but was interrupted by

Mr. LEET, who asked him to give way for the purpose of enabling him to make a motion that the House proceed to the election of public printer. He said that it was indispensably necessary that provision should be made to have the printing executed—that the public business was suffering. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means made a motion, on yesterday, to provide temporarily for printing, it being, he said, on the ground that it was absolutely necessary to facilitate the public business. Mr. L. was progressing in some further remarks, when he was interrupted by

Mr. SLADE, who claimed to proceed with his remarks; but was again interrupted by

Mr. BIDDLE, who wished, he said, to present to the House a petition with which he had been charged for several days, on the subject of safety guards to prevent explosions of steamboats.

Mr. SLADE said that if any way could be devised for him to permit the motions, and yet retain the floor upon the question before the House, he would willingly yield; on which suggestion he yielded, when

Mr. BIDDLE made a motion that the petition would be received by universal consent, and referred to a select committee; but objection having been made to its reception,

Mr. FISHER rose and said: The House will recollect that, on yesterday, I made known to it that I was absent from the hall when the gentleman from New York submitted a copy of his letter to General Green, and his remarks upon it; and that I could not then take notice of them, for the reason that I did not hear them. I stated, however, that when these remarks should appear in the papers, if I esteemed them of such a character as to require a notice from me, I should notice them this morning. I have read the report of the gentleman's remarks in the National Intelligencer of this morning, and I take it for granted that the report is correct, though I have been informed by some gentlemen of this House that some things are reported to have been said by the gentleman, which were not delivered by him to the House. Such as they were, they require some slight no ice from me.

I need scarcely allude to the circumstance that the gentleman chose to deliver those remarks in my absence. Whether this was done inadvertently, or with a view of "managing the thing adroitly," I leave it to this House to conclude; but I will say for myself, that I never will rise on this floor and direct my remarks to a gentleman behind his back, or in his absence. I look upon this procedure as not in accordance with what a gentleman should do. But the letter of the gentleman is before the public; my statement is before the public; the statement of the gentleman is before the public, and I will leave it to them to say whether the letter does not bear out every thing I said. What did I say? I will read an extract from the gentleman's letter, to show how fully it agrees with my statement. Mr. F. here read the following extract:

"It has occurred to me and other of my political friends, that such an arrangement could be made with you as would justify the entire Whig party in supporting you for that office."

Now, what was the arrangement that would justify the entire Whig party in supporting Gen. Green for that office? The letter tells. It is this:

"Now, what had passed through my mind, was simply this: that you should, in the event of your election, offer Gales and Seaton to share equally with them, respectively, the profits of the office, after allowing them a fair compensation out, for their personal services; they to do all the work at their office, and you to be elected to the station.

"The profits cannot be less for the whole Congress than $30,000; this would give you $10,000, you having no trouble or responsibility whatever."

That is the consideration, Mr. F. said. It is very true the gentleman says he "suggests this on his own responsibility;" but he goes on to say, "but, nevertheless, I hazard nothing in the conjecture, that if you are here and put in, the thing can be managed adroitly enough to insure success." I know not, said Mr. F. what the gentleman's ideas of ethics may be; he may think there is nothing like bribery in his proposition; but I leave it to the House and to the world to say whether its object was not to move is a certain direction, and offering $10,000 to produce a certain result. If it were proper to refer to General Green's letter, it would show that he looked upon the thing as pointing directly to certain gentlemen in this House. The gentleman says he spoke of no votes, and alluded to no particular individual; but was it to be supposed that he would come out in a matter of this kind, and name individuals occupying a particular position on this floor? The gentleman knows how to "manage such things too adroitly" to become so very specific as to name individuals, or even to name their party name or designation. My object, however, said Mr. F. in rising, is to say that my statement is before the world, with the letter of the gentleman and his statement, and let the world judge how they agree together. The main leading object of the gentleman's letter, was the offer of $10,000 to produce a certain result. I stated that in so many words, and the letter will bear me out in it.

Mr. MITCHELL said the House would bear him out in the assertion that he had acted throughout in this matter in self-defence. In reference to this business he was not accountable. He rose yesterday to redeem his promise to the House which he made when first he addressed them on the subject, and was not aware that the gentleman from North Carolina was not in the Hall till he looked around and found his seat vacant. He had given notice that as soon as he received a copy of his letter to General Green, he would lay it before the House, and at the earliest moment after receiving it, he redeemed his promise. He would now call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to something in his statement which he, (Mr. M.) wished him to explain—for it seemed strange that the gentleman should recollect so distinctly the particular words which appear in the letter when they are not in it at all. The gentleman in this statement says:

"The gentleman from New York commences the letter by saying that it had been distinctly ascertained that Messrs. Gales and Seaton could not be elected public Printers, and that his aversion to Mr. Blair was so great that he was disposed to go all lengths to defeat his election, and that he believed that, by the acquisition of a few votes, Gen. Green could be elected."

Now, said Mr. M. there is not a single word of this character in my letter. I did not allude to the acquisition of a few votes, nor did I say that my aversion to Mr. Blair was so great that I would go all lengths to defeat his election. And I said that I did not wish Gen. Green to do any act that was not justifiable to his conscience and to the world. It was to that particular part of the gentleman's statement that I wish to call his attention.

Mr. FISHER replied: In giving my statements, I did not pretend to give the exact words in the gentleman's letter, nor did I pretend to give all that was in it. I forgot the most material parts of it—I forgot all about "adroit management." As to what I said about Mr. Blair, I ask if the letter does not justify me in what I said. I will quote the gentleman's own words: "I have a strong desire to defeat Blair, and would be glad to do so in a way to oblige you personally." But, sir, I have done with the subject.

Mr. GRAVES here rose and called the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the Globe of yesterday evening, in which he said it was intimated that he had been guilty of a finesse by which a fraud was practised on the House. Mr G. then read the following:

"In the House, the Abolition discussion is continued. Mr. COLES's resolution, which would, if passed, have closed the debate, was laid on the table. Mr GRAVES, some days ago, moved a reconsideration; and this prevented Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi from moving it. Mr. GRAVES, to-day, having carried the reconsideration, withdrew the motion, and so Mr. COLES's proposition, was lost, it being held that it was too late for any other to move the reconsideration. This looks like finesse."

If, said Mr. G. I made this motion, and had afterwards withdrawn it with the view of preventing the gentleman from Mississippi, or any other gentleman, from making it, I should have committed a fraud on him, and on the House; but my object is now to show that I did no such thing. I mentioned my intention of moving the reconsideration to some gentlemen of the House, and to avoid interfering with the discussion going on, I postponed it until the latest hour at which the motion could be made.

When I thought the House was about to adjourn, I rose and remarked to the SPEAKER that I offered my motion now, because it could not be made after that day. I did not observe who had the floor, until the gentleman from Georgia observed that he yielded it to me. I then submitted the motion without having heard from the gentleman from Mississippi, or without having the least idea that he contemplated making such a motion; nor did I believe that he or any other gentleman intended to make it. I should feel myself unworthy of the seat I occupy here, if I were capable of deceiving any gentleman, or by any sort of finesse preventing him from offering a motion to this House. Neither the gentleman from Mississippi, nor any other gentleman, could say that he desired to make such a motion. When I perceived that it was the determination of the House that if this reconsideration prevailed, the question on the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina should be taken at once, and thus cut off the debate—the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COLQUITT,] who yielded him the floor, among others, I proposed to postpone the consideration until three o'clock, and that proposition not appearing satisfactory, I proposed to postpone it until twelve o'clock to-day. Both these propositions appearing to be unacceptable, and finding that, by persisting in my motion the debate would be cut off, I stated to the House that I could accomplish my object in an independent way, and would therefore withdraw my motion. So, sir, the charge that I was guilty of finesse, by which the gentleman from Mississippi was prevented from making his motion, is without any foundation.

Before I take my seat, Mr. G. said, I wish to make a remark or two in relation to another charge against me, which originated in the Government organ. In a report of the proceedings of this House, made by the Globe in relation to the New Jersey contested election case, he was represented as saying that "the members from New Jersey, who held the Governor's certificate, were entitled to their seats; and it was not in the power of this body to prevent them from taking them. He had no idea that they should be excluded, because five loafers might see proper to come there and claim their seats."

Now, at the time he made these remarks, he expressly disclaimed applying the term loafers to either of the sets of claimants from New Jersey, and the Intelligencer of the day reported him correctly as making the disclaimer. But by the report in the Globe, it appeared that he had denounced the gentlemen who came on in opposition to the returned members as five loafers This report was made the foundation, in several of the newspapers of the North, and particularly in one of them, [Mr. G. alluded to the New Era of New York,] for the most violent attacks on him, representing him as a blackguard in using language on that floor unbecoming a member of the body. Under these circumstances, he appealed to one of the New Jersey gentlemen, [Mr. DICKERSON,] with whom he was acquainted, to know whether he understood him as using that offensive language, and that gentleman assured him that he had not. He then applied to one of his colleagues, who belonged to the Administration party, to go to Mr. Blair and point out the injustice his report had done him, and to ask him to correct it. His colleague did go to Mr. Blair, and ask him to make the necessary correction of his report; but he was answered that he must receive a note, pointing out the error, which he would insert in his paper. Now, as he did not choose to enter into a correspondence with the editor of the Globe, the matter rested. It seems to me, said Mr. G. that when we admit persons here as reporters of debates, if they report remarks of persons to whom they are politically opposed, they should do it fairly, and not by reporting one sentence, and suppressing the qualification, convey a different idea of the speaker's meaning. For my own part, I would not care whether they reported me at all—but if they do report my remarks, I wish them to report all that I say. If I had known the Reporter of the Globe, who made the report to which I have adverted, I would have moved to expel him from the Hall. I will vote, Mr. G. said, to expel any Reporter from this Hall who dares to misrepresent a political adversary by reporting a part of his speech that may do him injustice, and not reporting the other part necessary to make him understood. After some further remarks from Mr. GRAVES.

Mr. BOYD, of Kentucky, observed that he was present, and listened to the speech of his colleague on the New Jersey election case, to which he referred; and he could, therefore, say, that it was true that he did qualify his remarks in relation to loafers coming to claim seats here, so as to show that he did not mean to apply them to either side of the New Jersey claimants. With regard to the part he took, or the statement he made to the Editor of the Globe, he would briefly say, that he met Mr. Blair, and stated to him, that in an editorial remark of his, he had misstated Mr. GRAVES, and that that gentleman requested him to make a correction. Mr. Blair denied that he had done so in any editorial remark, and said that if there was a misstatement of the gentleman, it must be in the report of the proceedings of the House; and, if so, he would with very great pleasure make any corrections that Mr. G. might deem necessary. He had no doubt but what the report his friend referred to was a misstatement, and so he informed the Editor; but he was under an impression at the time that it was in an editorial remark. The Editors of the Globe had made no editorial remarks in relation to the subject, but said that if there was a misstatement, it must be in the report, and that he would, with a great deal of pleasure, insert any correction that the gentleman might deem necessary. I thought it due to my colleague and to Mr. Blair to make this statement.

Mr. GRAVES. I submit to my colleague whether I did not request him to wait on Mr. Blair, and say to him that I had been misrepresented in a report in the Globe; and whether he had not seen in the columns of the New York New Era an article in which I was grossly abused, in consequence of the remarks I was represented in the Globe to have made. And I submit to him, Mr. G. said, whether I did not apply to him to go to Mr. Blair and get him to correct the erroneous report, without subjecting me to a correspondence.

Mr. BOYD. It is true that I saw a very abusive article in the New York Era, in relation to the remarks attributed to my colleague on the New Jersey election case; but I have not to this day read the report in the Globe on which my colleague says it was founded. It is true my colleague came to me, and requested that I would make the suggestion to the Editor of the Globe, to correct the report without subjecting him to a correspondence. But I went to Mr Blair, and he replied promptly that his columns were open, and that he would insert any correction the gentleman might deem necessary. It is true that my colleague applied to me to go again to Mr. Blair; but it is also true that I did not do it. I felt that I had done my duty in the part I had already taken.

Mr. STANLY observed that they would have nothing else to do, if they endeavored to correct the errors and falsehoods that appeared in that paper.

The SPEAKER called Mr. STANLY to order, and he took his seat.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said, as he had taken a part in this transaction, it was due to the gentleman from Kentucky that he should make a short statement. It was true he had voted with the majority to lay the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. COLES] on the table. It was true that he had had no conference with the gentleman from Kentucky in relation to the motion for reconsideration. It was also true that he, Mr. T. did not intend to make that motion on the day it was made. He was satisfied with his vote, and would now be far from changing it on the proposition, as it then read. But after the motion for reconsideration was made, he, Mr. T. held a private interview with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. COLES,] and told him that he would vote a reconsideration on condition that he [Mr. C.] would so change his proposition as to accord with the resolution passed at the last session on this subject, which had given general satisfaction to the country. He, Mr. T. assured the gentleman from Virginia that he never could consent to have this House recede from the position then taken in reference to these petitions. He was willing to rise higher, but never to give ground. The gentleman from Virginia agreed to make the amendment. Thereupon he, Mr. T. became desirous for a reconsideration, and was very reluctant for the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion. He expressed that reluctance to the gentleman himself, and endeavored to renew the motion; but the SPEAKER decided it to be out of his power.

Mr. SLADE then proceeded in his remarks, with a purpose, he said, to avoid any thing which might savor of harshness towards those who represent the peculiar interests of the South. In presenting petitions here, it had always been solely his purpose to discharge his duty to his constituents; the petitions from many of whom, he was understood to say, he had the honor of presenting he thought were rather too exciting. He believed many of these petitioners were over excited in their general movement for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and he believed, after they shall have accomplished that object, that they will have attained nothing then, comparatively speaking. Mr. S. said the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON] involved in itself an absurdity. The Constitution gives the House power to make rules of proceedings for the government of its own action; but this was not such a rule as was authorized by the Constitution; that this was not a rule to govern the future action of the House on a particular proposition, but in anticipation disposed of it without this action. He did not think there was any power in the Constitution thus to dispose of any matter in advance of its presentation. Each House is required by the Constitution to keep a journal of its proceedings, but this rule proposes that there shall be no proceeding at all. One-fifth of the members have also the right to demand the yeas and nays on every subject brought before Congress, yet this proposition goes to deprive the one-fifth of their privilege, on a certain subject, by legislating in advance upon it, and in opposition to the plain meaning of the Constitution. He contended that they had just as well make an order that all bills should be laid on the table without being read. The proposition, he said, amounted to an enactment that petitions on this subject shall not be received—that it was deceptive in its character—that it seemed upon its face in one aspect to give the House the right to act hereafter, but on another deprives it of that right. He argued to show that the laying the question of reception on the table, did not lay the petition on the table, but in point of fact, put it back into the pocket of the member who presented it—that it amounted to a decision that they should not be received. It was in effect the abridgment of the right of petition.

Mr. S. admitted that the House might refuse to receive petitions for a certain cause—that it might refuse to receive such as asked them to violate the Constitution, or presented, on their face, that which was highly obnoxious. He did not fully subscribe to the doctrine that a petitioner might demand the presentation and reception of a petition; for he thought the Representative had the right to refuse to present, and the House to receive, such petitions as were absurd, monstrous, and abusive in their character. Abolition petitions, he said, were not of this character: and he asked gentlemen whether, if they threw them out, it would not be an infringement of the Constitution—it would be depriving a class of citizens of the right of petition on a subject which they considered a grievance, and which Congress had the power to redress. He considered the proposition looked far beyond the question of slavery; and cautioned gentlemen to take care that, in their zeal to suppress petitions on this subject, they did not go too far, and establish odious principles. Mr. S. shewed how this principle, if once adopted, might operate to exclude petitions on any other subject. A law might be enacted, making a duty of 30 per cent. on importations; and their Southern brethren might load their tables with petitons, complaining that it was onerous, that they were on the road to ruin in consequence. They might petition against harbors, pre-emptions, post routes, or any other subject within our legislative powers. Yet the principles of the proposed rule would as well apply to this class of petitions as those on the subject of Abolition.

He asked gentlemen to look deliberately to what they were doing, to see whether they were not preparing halters for their own necks. Petitions might be presented praying the exposure of the corruptions of Government. Excitement was the only cause, it seemed, for the rejection of those on the subject of Abolition; but the fear of exposure might operate with equal propriety for those in power to resort to this rule to reject petitions on the subject of corruptions; it would be a convenient one to shut the mouths of the Representatives against those abuses. There would be no end to the direful effects of this rule; the question of right to petition was that upon which all hinges. Mr. S. then went into an argument to show that this was a fair subject for the legislative action of Congress. He contended that that article in the Constitution which gave Congress the power to "exercise exclusive legislation over the District," gave them power over this subject; and admitted if it was not so, there could be no grievance upon which to base those petitions. The language "exclusive legislation, carried upon its face its own verity—it was a self evident proposition, and could be made no plainer—the mere declaration carried home to every mind the conviction that the power exists. He said the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia had no more right to legislate for the District of Columbia, than they had to legislate for the State of Maine—that the District had no government, and no power to legislate for itself; and the power must, of consequence, exist in Congress alone. Mr. S. then cited authority of Mr. Madison, Patrick Henry, and various others, in proof of the fact that the power of Congress over the District was complete, and that the abolition of slavery therein was subject to the exclusive legislation of Congress. He then examined the nature of the grant by the States of Maryland and Virginia, in proof of his position, and read various reports of committees of Congress, touching the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, and bills proposing legislative action, and for the amelioration of the condition of the slaves. Whilst he admitted the right to reject petitions which proposed to Congress to violate the Constitution, yet he thought all petitions of doubtful character should be received. He looked upon the representative body as the embodyment of their constituency, and that they should receive the impression of their sentiments, and not treat with impunity their prayers. What (he said) was the right of petition worth if it did not have the ear of power? It could not be said that the right existed at all, if the petition was not received or listened to, and it was a gross violation of the right of petition to keep the petitioners without the hearing of that body. If this principle should obtain, the next thing would be to say that petitions should not be presented. As the ball rolls on, it would at last be made a penal offence to present Abolition or other petitions. The States that never come here as petitioners would, under this rule, be treated as if they were. He had in his possession a resolution of the Legislature of Vermont, protesting against the resolutions of the last Congress on this subject as a gag; but this would be drawn into the same common vortex with individual petitions. They had no right to presume in anticipation that a sovereign State would ask them to do an unconstitutional act. It was monstrous, making this sweeping rule, which even disregarded the sovereign power of a State. Mr. S. cited instances when slave States, and Alexandria had petitioned Congress upon this subject as a grievance; and argued that the citizens of Vermont had as much right to petition as they. He then advocated the principles of the Abolitionists, and showed that they did not wish to deprive the master of his slave by physical force, but thought slavery a grievance, and a fit subject for legislative action. Mr. S. continued at much length, and before concluding his remarks, yielded the floor to

Mr. PARRIS, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; but the question was taken by count, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 57.

The House then adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, January 20, 1840.

The CHAIR presented a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Iowa, asking for an appropriation to aid in completing the penitentiary in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of the administrators of John McHatton; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Charles Blight, in behalf of himself and the heirs of Robert Fulton; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. M. also presented the memorial of the corporate authorities of the City of Washington, praying for the improvement of certain streets and avenues;

And the memorial of the Board of Health, praying for the construction of a lunatic asylum; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Silence Elliot; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. D. also presented the petition of Thomas B. Parsons; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented the petition of Mary Brush; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of Polly Clough; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of a number of citizens of the State of Maine, praying the adoption of measures for effecting a Congress of nations for the purpose of adjusting international difficulties without a recourse to arms; which was laid on the table.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of the president and directors of the Portsmouth and Columbus Turnpike company, praying for a grant of public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of Lewis Feuchwanger, praying permission to issue as coin, of the value and denomination of one cent, a quantity of German silver, of which he is the inventor; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the memorial of Edmund Fanning, praying for assistance of Government for an expedition to the South Seas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. LUMPKIN, the petition and papers of Alfred Stewart, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion of Mr. MERRICK, to refer the papers in relation to the claim of the owners of the ship Allegany, to a select committee of three, was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. MERRICK, WRIGHT, SMITH of Indiana, HUBBARD and KING, was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the agents of steam jackets between the city of New York and various European ports, praying for a modification of the law allowing a drawback on imports, so as to allow a drawback on coal imported by them and used on their return voyages to Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. W. also presented the memorial of Esther Lefferts; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred

The memorial of a number of the surviving captors and representatives of deceased captors of the frigate Philadelphia, praying remuneration for their services; and

The petition of sundry widows of persons lost in the privateers of the United States, for renewal of pensions:

Severally asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Samuel Warner, made an adverse report thereon which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying for the confirmation of the claim of Francis Laventure and others, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, asking an appropriation for the removal of the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also from the same committee, to which had been referred the memorial of a religious community of St. Louis, denominated the "Ladies of the Sacred Heart," asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also from the same committee, to which had been referred a resolution of the Senate in relation to the repeal of duty on marble busts and statuary, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library; which was agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill providing for the continuance of the office of Commissioner of Pensions, and to transfer business heretofore transacted at the Navy Department to that office; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to explain the fifth section of the act for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of pursers in the navy; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEVIER, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STRANGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the several laws upon that subject as to allow all the newspapers in the respective States to publish the laws passed at each session of Congress as is now done by the three newspapers selected in each State, and in consideration thereof, and as the only compensation to be received by any newspaper therefor, be allowed to circulate within their respective States free of postage.

Mr. PRENTISS submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Ebenezer Swan, on account of a disability incurred by him in the military service of the United States.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

The bill for the armed occupation and settlement of that part of the Territory of Florida infested by marauding bands of hostile Indians, was taken up on its third reading.

After some remarks from Mr. PRESTON in opposition to the bill, the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and resulted yeas 24, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Strange, and White—15.

So the bill was passed.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL

Was then taken up on its third reading. Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate at great length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WALKER rose to reply to some of the remarks of Mr. CLAY; but at the suggestion of many Senators, gave way to a motion for adjournment.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, January 20, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced to the House that the subject before it was the special order of Saturday, being the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, to amend the rules by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition, praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon.

Mr. SLADE, who was entitled to the floor upon this subject, was proceeding, but was interrupted by Mr. KEIM, who begged permission to make a correction of his vote, on Friday last on the proposition of Mr. JONES, of Virginia, to suspend the rules to enable that gentleman to move a resolution that the Clerk be empowered to employ a competent person to execute the public printing until that officer was elected. Mr K. said that, in the list of yeas and nays upon that subject, as published in the Globe, his name appears among those who voted in the negative. Such was not the fact. He voted in the affirmative on that proposition.

Mr. SLADE resumed, and occupied the floor the whole day, in addition to Saturday, in defining the principles of the Abolition party, and vindicating it from the many reproaches which had (he said) been heaped upon it, and argued strongly that the question of expediency should not operate to defeat the ends of justice. He contended that Congress had the power to emancipate the slaves in the District of Columbia; that there was no implied faith given to Virginia and Maryland that the subject of slavery in said District should not be touched. He then took a review of the rise and progress of Abolition principles in England and in this country, at which he was much gratified, and concluded by defining his political position, and particularly in reference to the question of Abolition, and how far that question will influence him in giving support to the nomination of the Harrisburg Convention. He had last year determined to support that nomination, without regard to the peculiar notions of the nominee on the subject of slavery; and that, in giving his support to Mr. Harrison, he did not do so on account of his Abolition principles, but because the happy change which the principles he professed would work upon the future action of the Government, should he be elected.

Some effort was made by Mr. R. GARLAND to introduce a substitute to change the nature of the proposition before the House; to which, however, objection was made.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, obtained the floor; but gave way to

Mr. BLACK, who moved that the House do adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 55, nays 52.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 21, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States, furnishing information called for by a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ult. in relation to the amount of money paid from the Treasury to satisfy private claims for the five years preceding January, 1840; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of State, explaining the cause of delay in publishing the Biennial Register; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to the number of clerks employed in that Department during the past year, and their amounts of compensation; which was laid on the table.

Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th inst. in relation to the establishment of marine hospitals at the mouth of the Arkansas river; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, showing the amounts appropriated and expended, and the balances remaining in hand, for the service of that Department during the year 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the State of Vermont, praying such further legislation of Congress as will effectually abolish the foreign slave trade; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. P. also presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Vermont, praying the passage of a law to prohibit the local authorities in the District of Columbia from imprisoning free persons of color, and selling them in satisfaction of jail fees, on the presumption of their being slaves.

The reception being objected to, the motion to receive was,

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEVIER presented documents in relation to the claim of John C. Reynolds; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of T. F. Peterson, praying permission to purchase from the Government a certain island, situated near the mouths of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of John Diele, a citizen of the United States, praying that a work published by him in the Sandwich Islands may be admitted into the United States free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of John Johnston, praying to be released from a judgment obtained against him; which was referred to the Committeee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PIERCE presented the petition of John Crawford, praying arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Charles D. Connor, praying to be allowed the right of preemption to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the petition of Jacob Dunham, praying remuneration for property destroyed during the late war, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred

A bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting pre-emption rights, which was approved on the 19th of June, 1834; and

A bill for the relief of Sutton Stephens;

Reported the same without amendment.

Mr. C. also from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the the memorial of the President and Directors of the Portsmouth and Columbus Turnpike company; which was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred a bill to grant to the States and incorporated companies engaged the construction of roads and canals, the right of way through the public lands of the United States, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred a bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. S. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Jubal B. Hancock; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BETTS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of John Burke, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of the Western Academy of St. Louis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of Chalon Guard, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. STRANGE was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate if there be not a considerable number (and what number) of donation claims, or settlement rights, under the acts of Congress of 1812 and 1819, for lands situate in the State of Mississippi, south of the 31st degree of north latitude, which have been proven under these laws, and surveyed, plotted and returned to the surveyor's office of the district by the deputy surveyor of the United States appointed thereto, but the titles to which are thereupon suspended on imputation of irregularity in the surveys in regard to form and location. 2. Also, whether or not the surveys excepted to, exceed or diminish the quantity of land to which claimants are entitled. 3. How long since these surveys have been executed, and what proportion of them have been perfected in title. 4. What is the description and quality of land generally in which these surveys are made. 5. And whether, in the opinion of the commissioner, if such surveys be irregular, it would not be better economy for the Government to confirm them as made than incur the expense of resurvey.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL

Was then taken up, and, after a speech of much ability from Mr. WALKER, was, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, informally passed over.

The bill for the relief of certain persons therein named, was taken up, and, after some remarks from Messrs. TAPPAN, GRUNDY, CLAY, of Alabama, and ROBINSON, was ordered to be engrossed.

The Senate then went into Executive business, and afterwards

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 21, 1840.

The question before the House was the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, to amend the rules by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, being entitled to the floor,

Mr. JOHNSON asked the gentleman to give way, to enable him to offer a resolution which proposed to give to the suffering poor of the District all the surplus wood at the Capitol belonging to the Government, which he believed to be about forty cords.

Mr. FISHER objected to the introduction of the resolution at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON asked for a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, interfered, and said he would be pleased to accommodate the gentleman by yielding it, if no objection be made to the proposition; but he anticipated there would be.

Mr. POPE here rose, and wished to prevail on Mr. GARLAND to yield, to enable him to make a report from a committee on the subject of the Iowa and Missouri boundary question.

Mr. JOHNSON again interposed to press the propriety and necessity of granting the relief contemplated in his resolution.

Mr. GARLAND said he was willing to yield the floor, if it was the understanding by the CHAIR that he would be entitled to it afterwards.

The CHAIR said there could be no such understanding.

Mr. PROFFIT asked Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, (who was entitled to the floor,) to yield it to him for one moment, for the purpose of introducing a resolution which he (Mr. P.) deemed of great importance, as calling for information which the country—the whole country—demanded. Mr. P. said, that if the introduction of the resolution gave rise to one word of debate—if a single objection was made—he would consider it his duty, in return for the courtesy of the gentleman from Virginia, to withdraw the resolution; giving notice, however, that upon the first opportunity the subject should be brought before the House.

Mr. GARLAND having yielded the floor,

Mr. PROFFIT read the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary at War be directed to inform this House, at his earliest convenience, whether he has or has not ordered or authorized the use of bloodhounds in the war with the Indians in Florida. Also, if such order or authority has been given, whether any importation of bloodhounds has been ordered, and from what country. Also, the name of the agent employed to purchase and select said bloodhounds. Also, the number of bloodhounds ordered. Also, whether any bloodhounds have actually arrived; and also, if the use of the bloodhounds is determined on, the Secretary of War is further directed to state the name of the officer in the American army under whose immediate charge and command the bloodhounds are to be used.

After the resolution was read, objection being made by some members, Mr. P. withdrew it.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia said, upon the question of human rights, as being involved in the subject before the House, he had nothing to say. He never would consent to discuss the moral question of human rights there, because he believed it was one with which that House had no right to interfere—had no jurisdiction; that it was a question which belonged exclusively to the States. With him there was but one argument—that so long as the slave States thought proper to maintain the existence of slavery among them, he would, as they would, defend it to the utmost extremity. He considered that the question involved a higher one than the mere right and expediency of abolishing slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; it involved the question whether the people have created an entire despotism over this District—whether the people here were mere serfs, and have no rights. Mr. G. replied to that part of the remarks of Mr. BIDDLE, a few days ago, in which that gentleman had blended the great right of petition with the question of reception. He denied that such was a correct position, and thought that it did not interfere with any rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution, to refuse to receive their petitions; and called upon gentleman to point out wherein it was inconsistent with that right. The gentleman from Vermont, Mr. SLADE, had, he said, conceded the whole ground that that right was at all infringed by the rejection of petitions praying unconstitutional legislation; and he believed that, although the people have a right to assemble and petition Congress for a redress of grievances, yet Congress had the right to refuse to receive such as called upon them to do an unconstitutional act. Here the great constitutional principle was clear and conclusive.

Mr. G. then read from the first article of the amendments of the Constitution the words, "that Congress should make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances." He said there were three distinct principles in this clause. He asked gentlemen if a petition came there praying Congress to establish a particular religion, whether they would be bound to receive it, with the above clause staring them in the face.

The freedom of the press—yes, its licentiousness, was protected under this clause; and he would ask if a petition be presented praying that that powerful engine be trammelled and broken down, whether they would receive it. He believed not; because they had, under the Constitution, no power to interfere with the subject, and ought not to consider such a petition. Mr. G. then referred to the circumstances of the times, which induced the placing of that guard in the Constitution against the invasion of the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances. The reason why it was thus engrafted in that instrument, was because the framers of it had seen that the British Parliament had gone into the body of the people, and restricted and limited their right to assemble.

Mr. G. then read from page 141 of the Manual, where, according to parliamentary law, it is made necessary that petitions must be subscribed by the petitioners; or if not, must be certified by the member presenting it, that it is their handwriting, or some person without the doors that they know the hand-writing of the petitioners; that the member presenting it, also, must state its contents briefly; a regular motion must be also made, and he question put whether it shall be received.

Mr. G. asked, if Congress had no discretion over the subject, why was all this caution in the rules necessary? The rule which required its contents to be stated would be an unmeaning one. Its object was first to ascertain whether the subject was within the legitimate jurisdiction of those they petition. Why make the responsibility rest on a member, of certifying to its contents and the identity of the handwriting, if there was no discretion? If there was no discretion they could not reject it. Then why put the question, if the House have not that power? The power, he believed, should be exercised with great discretion; but that they had the power to reject was incontrovertible.

Mr. G. then argued at some length as to the rights of the people of the District, which he said would be annihilated if the principles advanced on that floor should obtain—that they had no voice in this matter; it would make them as defenceless as the serfs of Russia. He contended that the people are entitled to all the benefits of the provisions of the Constitution which recognise slaves as property, to the same extent that they enjoyed those rights before the cession of the District by Maryland and Virginia. He argued that the people of the District were entitled to the same protection to this species of property as any other kind, under the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which says, "that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated." He further contended that Congress could not deprive the people of the District of any of the rights which they enjoy in general as a part of the United States. Slaves, he said, are recognised by the Constitution as property, and Congress had no right to take it even for public purposes without just compensation. He would excite the people of the District to rebellion against the despotism of the principle advanced, that they had no right to resist any action of Congress which went to deprive them of their property.

Mr. G. then examined that clause of the Constitution which gave Congress the right to exercise exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia, which he defined to mean that it should exercise only such powers as were not prohibited in that instrument, and which were exclusive of the powers of the States. He then examined the question with reference to the slave trade in this District, contending that the people thereof had the power to dispose of this species of property to the citizens of any other State; and that Congress had no more power to interfere with or interdict this trade in the District than they had to prevent it between the citizens of Md. and Va.; and said it would be a more dangerous innovation of individual rights than that of which the Abolitionists complained. He then examined that prohibition in the Constitution against the African slave trade after a certain period, which, he said, was placed there at the instance of the Southern States. The States now complaining of the evils of slavery, were then in favor of that trade, and would not consent to that prohibition, unless the period at which it was to cease was fixed twenty years in the future; and that the Eastern people had two seamen engaged in that trade to one Southern seamen. Mr. G. then argued this question in all its constitutional bearings, and conclusively proved that that Congress had no power at all over the subject; and that it rested entirely with the States and the people of the District of Columbia to make the first movement towards emancipation. After adverting at some length to the dangers to be apprehended from the movements of the Abolitionists, he believed that the excitement would not be allayed by the reception of petitions, and cited the many instances of reports having already been made upon the subject of these petitions. Mr. Pinckney's able report, he said, had not prevented discussion, and he did not believe that a reference of the petitions would now have any better effect than it did at the time that report was made, or when the first report was made, which was in the year 1783. Mr. G. concluded by saying that he would take whatever stand his friends from the South would take, and appealed to the friends of the Constitution in the North to take the old stand they had heretofore occupied on that question. He said he did not want discussion on this subject, and had voted from the beginning in favor of every proposition to that end, not because he feared to meet it, but because the North had no right whatever to interfere with it, nor that House to legislate upon it, as proposed in the petitions.

Mr. BUTLER, of South Carolina, observed that it had not been the habit of gentlemen of the South to discuss the constitutionality, expediency, or immorality of slavery, and he, believing such discussions to be useless, as well as injurious, would therefore be the last man to engage in them. He wished he could say, with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND] that he felt no excitement on this subject; but, as excitable as he felt, and he acknowledged without hesitation that he did so, he would endeavor to discuss it calmly, as became a citizen of this great Republic, as became one who felt a vital interest in its safety, and who had endeavored to lay aside all sectional prejudices. It had always been his course, in the part of the country from which he came, to throw what influence he had in the scale against sectional feelings. If such feelings entered at all in this question, it was not the fault of the South. Upon this, as upon all other questions, the South asked no protection; it only asked to be let alone, and be permitted to judge of its own affairs.

Opinions and sentiments had been proclaimed on that floor which required an answer. One gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] seemed to intimate in the opening of his address, that the gentlemen from the South, so far as this question was involved, were the slaves of sectional and local opinions. We, sir, might ask, continued Mr. B. who is more a slave to local opinions than the gentleman himself, in adopting the course he had. The gentleman from New York referred them to Congressional history to show that these petitions had been offered and received for the last thirty years, without creating any excitement until the year 1836. That might have been the fact, but who did not know that the vital importance of the subject had grown up from the fact, that the Abolitionists of the North were no longer weak, ignorant, and powerless, as they were thirty years ago, but that they now were, as the gentleman himself proclaimed, men of talents, of property, and of influence, while their numbers were daily increasing. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was entirely mistaken when he supposed that the discussions on this exciting subject would be put an end to by a reference of it to a committee. It had been well shown by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] that the reference made in 1836, under the resolutions of Mr. Pinckney, as well as the reference that was made in 1780, so far from putting a stop to the presentation of these petitions, was followed by an increased number of them. And such, he would venture to assert, would always be the inevitable result of treating Abolition petitions in that manner.

The issue made up was not on the right of petition, as some gentlemen contended. He would say, to one and all of them, that they should make the truth known to their constituents; that they should go home and tell those who charged them with the presentation of such petitions, that the true issue now presented on that floor was one of union or disunion. It was not to be disguised that that was the issue now before the House and the country. He did not, like some gentlemen, say that he never would calculate its value when an evil of this magnitude was presented. He did calculate its value. He valued it and loved it as the surest safeguard of our liberties. It could not be expected that any man here should forget in half a century the common toils and dangers of our ancestors, or the objects for which they encountered them. He claimed for himself as much veneration and love for this Union as any man in the nation; but he was compelled to say, that the moment Congress attempted to legislate on this subject, the Union was practically dissolved—the moment Congress abolished slavery in the District of Columbia, the States interested would look upon it as a direct attack upon them, and act accordingly. We of the South, said Mr. B., are not afraid to discuss the subject of slavery. We believe the institution to be defensible from the scripture itself; we believe that it has always existed; and we believe, with Governor McDuffie, that to us it has proved a political blessing. I will ask the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] whose tears of sympathy for the slave, he says, have been so often shed, if he has no sympathy for the whites of the South; if he does not feel for his white fellow citizens of the South, as well as for his black brethren. If the object of his abolition petitions, an object he has so much at heart, could be accomplished, the white people of the South would cease to live. No man who knows the South but must know this truth; that things must exist at the South as they do now or no free white man or woman can live there. The South, as he said before, claimed no particular protection from this Government. When money was to be expended for coast and harbor defence, it was for the North. When money was to be expended for the improvement of rivers and harbors, it was for the North; and so in most cases when the benefits of this Government were to be dispensed, it was for the North. The South, however, asked for no special favors. All that it did ask, was to be permitted to direct their own institutions without molestation.

It had been pointedly asked on that floor how it was that persons occupying the position which he and his State Rights friends did, could attach themselves to, and act with the Administration party in that House. This question was easily answered. We are not, said Mr. B. partisans of the Administration, nor do we intend to become so. We support the leading measures of the Administration because we believe them to be calculated to promote the best interests of the country. Mr. B. made a few observations which were not heard, owing to his face being turned from the Reporter; when

The SPEAKER informed him that it was not in order to discuss a subject not before the House.

Mr. B continued. He was not going to define his position as some gentlemen were in the habit of doing. He should let his position take care of itself, and define itself, by the votes he should give; but he was going to state why it was that he and his State Rights friends were so often found acting with the Administration. We do so, said he, because we know that whatever might have been the former opinions of the Chief Magistrate, he supports the best interests of the whole Union. We do so because, upon the paramount importance attached to this Abolition question, he says that he not only believes that it would be a violation of the Constitution for Congress to legislate on the subject of slavery in the States, but as regards the District of Columbia, that to abolish slavery in it would be highly inexpedient, a violation of the implied faith of the Government to the States of Virginia and Maryland, and that, therefore, he should veto any bill passed for that purpose. Was it because blows had formerly been struck between the distinguished individual who was now Chief Magistrate and the State Rights party, that the latter should not now support him when he was pursuing a line of policy which their judgment approved? Whatever his course might have been on the Missouri and other questions, his course now, on all these questions which deeply interested the South, was perfectly sound; and he regretted to say, that he could not regard the principles of the gentleman put in opposition to him for the Presidency [Gen. Harrison] as equally sound; for he should desire to see every man put in nomination for that high station, entertaining correct views on these important questions. But was this the case with the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention? Sir, said Mr. B. it is known that this distinguished individual, in a letter written by him so late as 1833, said that he would desire to see all the surplus revenues of the country appropriated for the purposes of emancipation and colonization. With this declaration staring him in the face, how could any Southern man support this gentleman for the highest office in the Republic? Again: on one occasion in 1836, this gentleman was called on to avow his opinions on the subject of Abolition, but he declined giving any answer. The Democratic party, however, have no such reluctance to avow their opinions. A Democratic convention was lately held at Columbus, in the State of Ohio, and, among others, passed the following resolutions:

[Mr. B. here read the resolutions on the subject of Abolition and Abolition societies, adopted by the Columbus Convention; for which see another part of to day's paper.]

There was another resolution, (Mr. B. said,) providing that, should there be any members of the Convention who did not subscribe to the principles contained in the resolutions relating to the subject of Abolition, they were requested to leave their names with the publishing committee, to be published with the proceedings. And he was authorized to say (Mr. B. continued) that no man has left his name with that committee. So that the position (Mr. B. said) we occupy is this: we act with the Administration without being its partisans so long as it supports the principles to which we are committed. Mr. B. after some further remarks, said he regarded the vote taken on the nomination at the Harrisburg Convention as indicative of the position of the Whig party. The ground he took, and that he believed to be true, was that the Abolitionists support, and are attached to the Whig party. If he was wrong, he desired to be corrected. He had a slip from a newspaper, which stated that General Harrison belonged to the Abolitionist party; and though he did not undertake to say that this was true, he knew that he had been written to to avow his opinions on the subject of slavery, by some of those who wished to vote for him, and that he had to this day declined an answer. Mr. B. in conclusion, said he had no idea, when he rose, of occupying the time of the House for more than a few minutes. All he desired was to discuss the question as it should be discussed, and to tell gentlemen from all parts of the Union that they should go home to their constituents, and tell them that the South was deeply excited on this subject; that they demanded to be permitted to attend to their own interests, unmolested by other sections of the Union; and that a continued agitation of this subject would endanger the Union. If gentlemen loved the Union as they professed to do—if they wished that this fair fabric should descend unimpaired to their posterity, they would present this question in its true aspects to their constituents.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose and submitted an amendment, which he said he should move the previous question on; and, after some remarks on a point of order from Messrs. DROMGOOLE, ADAMS, UNDERWOOD, MASON, THOMPSON, of South Carolina, and GARLAND, of Louisiana, the amendment was then read as follows:

Srike out all after the word resolved, and insert, that all petitions, memorials, remonstrances, addresses, resolutions, propositions, or papers of any description, touching the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in the District of Columbia, in the Territories of the United States, or in any State of this Union, or to the transportation of slaves from any State, District or Territory of the United States, to any other State, District or Territory, or relating in whole or in part, in any way, or to any extent whatever, to these subjects, shall be laid on the table, without a question and without action or debate, and the same shall not be printed.

Mr. WARREN, of Georgia, submitted whether it was in order; the amendment being, as he contended, the same thing in substance as the resolution of Mr. COLES, which was laid on the table.

After some remarks from Messrs. WARREN, BRIGGS, and DROMGOOLE,

Mr. BLACK appealed to the courtesy of the gentleman from Virginia and the liberality of the House, and proposed that every member who had an amendment to submit, should be permitted to offer it, and have it read for the information of the House. In this way, Mr. B. said, every gentleman could place himself in the position he desired to occupy, and the question could be taken on each resolution separately in their order, without debate.

Mr. DROMGOOLE would only remark that no consent of his would change the rules of the House. It was for the SPEAKER, and not for him to say whether the gentleman's proposition was in order.

Mr. BLACK said he only meant to say that he was indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Virginia, who was entitled to the floor, for allowing him an opportunity of making the proposition he did to the House. He hoped his resolution might be read, and he hoped that every gentleman who desired to do so, might be permitted to offer his amendment, for the purpose of showing his views on this question.

Mr. BLACK's resolution was then read as follows, for the information of the House; but several voices opposing its reception, it was not received:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any petition or other paper, praying for or touching the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, in the States of this Confederacy, or in the Territories thereof, the same shall be not received.

After a debate on the point of order raised by Mr. WARREN, in which Messrs. DROMGOOLE, POPE, BRIGGS, THOMPSON, SMITH, of Indiana, BANKS, WARREN, TURNEY, and EVERETT took part,

The SPEAKER decided that Mr. DROMGOOLE's amendment being in substance the same thing with the resolution of Mr. COLES, which was laid on the table, it could not be received.

Mr. DROMGOOLE took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR; but on taking the question on the appeal, the CHAIR was sustained—yeas 120, nays 64.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then, after some remarks, in which he stated he conceived it to be his duty to put a stop to this useless and unnecessary debate, moved the previous question on Mr. THOMPSON's resolutions; when

Mr. HOFFMAN moved for a call of the House, which was ordered; and the roll having been called over, 201 members answered to their names.

After calling the absentees, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with; and

The question was taken, "Will the House second the call for the previous qustion?" and decided in the negative, (Messrs. RAMSEY, of Pennsylvania, and JOHNSON, of Maryland being tellers)—ayes 98, noes 99.

Mr. ADAMS then submitted his amendment as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st.

"Every petition presented by the SPEAKER, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, "shall the petition be rejected?" and no petition shall be rejected but by a majority of the members present."

On motion by Mr. ADAMS,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, Jan. 22, 1840.

Mr. WHITE submitted documents in relation to the memorial of a number of citizens of Milwaukie, remonstrating against the confirmation of the claims of Francis Laventure and others to certain tracts of land; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of Ira H. Sabin, praying the right of pre-emption to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BETTS presented the memorial of George G. Bishop and J. D. Loomsbury, engaged in the manufacture of wool, praying a revision of the revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of certain companies of Missouri volunteers, reported the same without amendment.

The following resolution submitted by Mr. CLAY of Alabama yesterday, was taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for a stereotype edition of the laws of the United States, to embrace all laws of a general nature.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HENDERSON was considered and adopted.

The bill for the relief of certain persons therein named, was taken up on its third reading, and after the title was amended, was read a third time, and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of Thomas H. Owen and John W. Skidmore and others, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole; and after some remarks by Messrs. ROBINSON, YOUNG, and TAPPAN, was ordered to be laid on the table.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL

Was then taken up, and Mr. BUCHANAN spoke at great length, and with much ability, in defence of the bill, and in reply to Mr. CLAY, who rejoined; and after some further remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN, CLAY of Kentucky, and WALKER,

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1840.

The question before the House was the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina to amend the rules, by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon.

And the proposition of Mr. ADAMS, as a substitute for the above, in the following words:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the Speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, shall the petition be rejected? and no petition shall be rejected but by a majority of the members present."

Mr. J. W. JONES, by the permission of Mr. ADAMS, reported, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1840; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. W. JONES also, by leave, introduced detailed statements accompanying the bill; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. GARLAND inquired the use of ordering any printing, or how it would be done.

Mr. J. W. JONES said the object in having it ordered now was, that so soon as the order was taken for having the printing done, or a printer elected, it would be ready to hand over for immediate execution.

Mr. J. said that the public service indispensably required that the appropriation bills should be considered before the end of March; and it was impossible that the members could even inform themselves of estimates and other matters which they should know, if the printing of these bills and estimates be not provided for; and thought it high time that the House should go into the consideration of some bills, and, as a necessary preparatory step to facilitate action on them, he would offer a resolution providing for the printing thereof.

Mr. J. then introduced his resolution proposing to empower the Clerk to have the necessary printing executed under the same conditions as those of the resolution of 1819.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he would not object to the resolution of the gentleman if he would so modify it as to authorize the Clerk to have it done upon the most moderate terms, and to apply only to the bills and documents now necessary to be printed.

Mr. JONES said he was willing to modify his resolution to make it apply only to the bills reported, and statements accompanying.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected, without he would consent to all the conditions.

Mr. JONES said it was impossible, he believed, to adopt any modification of his proposition to meet all the objections of gentlemen; if he acceded to this, there were members ready to urge others. He had modified it so as to cover the case of present necessity, to meet the views of the gentleman from Louisiana. He thought it better now to move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested to Mr. JONES to effect his object, to have the necessary printing executed, that it would be better to move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the printing of the bills, and then so amend that motion as to authorize the Clerk to have said bills and statements printed. It would require a majority only to effect that object, but would require a vote of two-thirds to suspend the rules to effect the same purpose. Mr. B. concluded by making the motion to reconsider.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected to any indirect manner of appointing Printer. The resolution goes to give the Clerk the power to appoint that officer, when it was the duty of the House to do so. He was opposed to giving this power to the Clerk, unless the modification suggested by him should be adopted of giving it to those who would do it on the best terms.

Mr. BRIGGS pressed his motion for reconsideration, but at the suggestion of Mr. J. W. JONES that such motion would not be in order,

Mr. BRIGGS withdrew it.

Mr. ADAMS was about proceeding in his remarks, but was appealed to by

Mr. SARGEANT, who wished to get the consent of the House to report from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill in amendment of the act for taking the next census.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected. He had much of the business of his constituents unattended to, and would not consent to give any right to introduce business from other sources, unless all were put on the same footing.

Mr. ADAMS claimed the floor, and proceeded in his remarks, not with the view of discussing the subject of the petitions, or slavery, or slave trade in any form, because it would occupy two much time; but to show his objection to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] by which he said it would be impossible to know what petitions to receive or what to reject. It was impossible, he said, to keep this subject of slavery from before the House, no matter what precaution gentlemen adopted for that purpose. It would necessarily come upon other propositions than abolition petitions. The subject of entering into commercial relations with Hayti, would bring the whole matter up for discussion. He charged the Southern gentlemen, who introduced the resolutions to suppress these petitions with all the delay of the public business, and for the discussion now going on before the House. It was not by his instance that this delay was caused, as had been frequently been attributed to him at previous sessions. He did not believe that if there was a proposition before them immediately to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, there would be found ten to vote for it. He for one was not prepared to go for it, as he had at the previous session stated, nor did he believe that his friend from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] who had so ably advocated the cause of human rights, was prepared to vote for it; he took it for granted that he was not from his remarks. He thought if gentlemen wanted to allay the agitation, they ought to introduce such a proposition, and see what vote it would get. Mr. A. then examined the character of the different propositions before the House, some of which were of such a nature, he said, as to suspend the question of reception of these petitions between the earth and heaven, or the earth and another place.

He then compared the nature of the proposition now before them with that of the last session. The proposition of last year authorized the reception of Abolition petitions, (at least the SPEAKER then so decided,) but this goes much farther. It proposes to make it a permanent rule of the House to operate for two sessions, in effect that they shall not be received. It was this proposition to which was chargeable all the discussion, and he hoped it would not again be laid at the doors of the Abolitionists; he hoped the day would come when he would be enabled to give his views at length on the great question involved, which he said would not be on a petition for the abolition of slavery in this District, but on a more important subject. He adverted at the same time to the controversy going on between four of the States of the Confederacy, which, he said, were now almost on the verge of a civil war on this very question, of which the President had not noticed, but which he thought he should have brought before them. He charged gentlemen not to quiet their fears, if they have any, by the adoption of such a resolution as proposed, for if they did, they would be waked from that slumber by voices more potent than from the dead. They cannot keep the question out of the House; they had already heard the merits of slavery defended in the debates; all that could be said, had been said by its friends; but when the question should come properly before the House, the laws of nature, of God, the Declaration of Independence of the thirteen original States, would be the ground the friends of freedom would take in that House to defend.

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, said, as one or those who hod spoken on the subject, he would correct the gentleman in one particular. The gentleman asserted that all that could be said had been said in defence of slavery. He, for one, had not entered at all into the discussion of the subject of slavery, but the constitutional right of property alone.

Mr. ADAMS again proceeded, by saying that the proposition before the House was a small way of getting rid of the question, by making a motion to receive the petition, and then laying that motion on the table. It was unbecoming the general character of the movers, and resembled more the character of the wooden nutmeg of the Yankee trader. He knew the proposition must have sprung from some other quarter, as those gentlemen who offered them, he was confident, were in favor of the rejection of the petitions. This was one which would leave the question unsettled. He hoped this proposition of hanging up did not come from the Yankee land. It was impossible to know by this process whether that which the petitioners complained of was a grievance or not, though it was just and reasonable that this inquiry should be first made before disposing of petitions. It was essential to the existence of the Government.

Mr. A. said the right of petition would have existed as much without that article of the Constitution, which secures to the people the right to assemble and petition Congress as if it had not been placed there. It was inserted there at the instance of Virginia, to prevent its abridgement by Congress; it was a prohibition against its abridgment; it was inextricably interwoven with Congress. The greatest despot on the earth was bound to receive petitions from the meanest of his subjects; it was a right which was founded on the important nature of man, and he was exceedingly sorry to see any thing that would abridge it. This resolution, and all those moved by Southern gentlemen, whether intended or not, had that effect. Congress could not specify one class of petitions, and say it would not receive them, without its effect extending to all classes; and hence the great danger of adopting the rules proposed.

Parliamentary precedents had been referred to as a justification by this House for the rejection of Abolition petitions. He knew of only two precedents of the British Parliament; and these were, that that body had undertaken to reject petitions against high taxes. The petition against the stamp act had been rejected by the application of the very principles contended for on that floor. These are the precedents which can be adduced to prove that Congress has a right to reject petitions. He thought Parliament had much stronger authority for rejecting those petitions than that House had for these proposed.

Mr. A. then examined the constitutional right to assemble and petition Congress for redress of grievances, which, he said, (notwithstanding they had the right to refuse to receive those which were offensive in their character and insulting to that body,) left no discretion to reject; if it did, its reception would ultimately depend upon whether the petitioners belonged to the party of the majority or minority in that House.

Mr. A. said he would not thank any gentleman to vote for the reception of a petition, without agreeing to consider it, for with him the right of petition consisted in its reception and consideration. To receive, and hear, and consider, when presented decently, and containing no matter offensive to the House, was what that right consisted in.

He then read an article in support of the above opinion, showing that this constituted the right in the British House of Commons.

He thought the House of Representatives of a great nation ought to deal more candidly and openly with this matter—that to act in the manner proposed was unworthy of this mighty nation.

Mr. A. here adverted to the controversy going on between the Governors of Virginia and New York, and Georgia and Maine, in which this very question was involved. They discuss it with ability, but the Governor of Virginia has already threatened to resort to first principles if the point he is contending for be not yielded to him. He thought this controversy would ultimately bring the whole question before the House, and that it would be better to meet it now. If the course proposed now be persisted in, it would lead this country to a civil war; to avoid which, he was for having all said that could be said on both sides, and then come to such a compromise as would be mutually acquiesced in. The discussion had been fully entered into in the convention, before the adoption of the Constitution; and the parties there came together, and have been kept together for upwards of fifty years. They could not bring the people of the North to terms, or convert them by the course proposed to be pursued. When they should come to a question of war, the friends of the North would stand up to their rights as well as the South. When their institutions are threatened with violence, he hoped they would defend them in the best way possible; but as it was not the case now, he would invite the South to reason with the North upon this question. Mr. A. said he was more opposed to this proposition than that of last year, because it is proposed to make it a permanent law of the House. Some of the petitions are addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, but by the operation of the proposed rule, it would neither receive the petition, or allow the petitioner the right to withdraw, and present it to the other body.

Mr. A. then made some remarks in favor of his own proposition, which makes it the duty to receive all petitions, except by objection for special reasons, which shall be decided by the vote of a majority. It does not specify in what manner they shall be disposed of. All he wanted was, that the great right of petition should be acknowledged. He was unwilling to admit the right of the House to reject, without the reasons should be given for it and entered on the journal. Such a course would prevent any objections to these petitions in future, and entirely allay all excitement upon the subject.

Mr. ALFORD then obtained the floor, and discussed at length the great constitutional principles involved in this question, defended the rights of the South, and defined his political position with reference to the approaching Presidential contest. The lateness of the hour prevents the Reporters from giving a brief synopsis of his views. His speech will be published at length hereafter.

Mr. HUNT having obtained the floor, said that it was his intention to make a few brief remarks, but as he was then laboring under a slight indisposition, he would ask the House, as a personal favor, to consent to a motion of adjournment.

The motion being made,

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were—yeas 85, nays 94. So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HAND said he had voted against the adjournment, with a view of asking the House to entertain a proposition he wished to present, the object of which was to consider all other petitions having no connection with the present subject.

After some debate of a conversational character, several members here stated that they did not know that Mr. HUNT was laboring under indisposition, or they would not have voted against the adjournment, and remarked that they would consent to an adjournment.

Mr. MONROE renewed the motion to adjourn, which was carried.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 23, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 17th inst. a portion of which was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 6, 1839.

SIR: The British Minister, in a note addressed on the 2d instant, to this Department, states that information, which had reached his Government in England, and more recent intelligence received by himself from the authorities of the Province of New Brunswick, had made it his duty to call the attention of the Government of the United States, to the alleged facts that—1stly. The armed posse stationed by the State of Maine, for the protection of the public property in the disputed territory, had extended its operation, and its armed occupation of the country along the whole way from the valley of the Restook to the mouth of Fish river, into the valley of St. John, and thus into a portion of the Madawaska settlements. 2dly. That the establishments formed by persons composing the armed parties, on the banks both of the Restook and the Fish river, had assumed an aspect and character decidedly military, and more representing a permanent national possession of the country, than could be required in the civil posse of a land agent, temporarily occupying it for the sole purpose of preventing trespasses. That those establishments were fortified with entrenchments and cannon, and garrisoned by a number of armed men, far greater than the occasion would warrant. 3dly. That a permanent State road is being constructed, leading into the valley of the Restook, and from thence on the south side of the St. Johns, to the Fish river; the object of which is to connect those portions of the disputed territory, with the towns of Augusta and Bangor, and other acknowledged parts of the the State of Maine. 4thly. That, moreover, land surveyors, acting under the authority of the State, are employed in marking out lots and townships within the same portion of the disputed territory; and that sales of lands are being made, with deeds regularly drawn under the authority of Maine.

The British minister protesting in the name of his Government, against acts of encroachment on the part of the people of Maine, as being at variance with the agreements entered into in the month of February last, first between him and the Secretary of State at Washington, and subsequently, by your Excellency, the Governor of New Brunswick, and Major General Scott, for the purpose of averting the danger of local collision on the frontier, pending the final settlement of the boundary question between the two Governments, thinks that the establishment, in the meantime, of the new interests, and the growing up, as it were, of new proprietary claims upon the lands yet in dispute, which are likely to be the result of the acts referred to, may end by embarrassing the action of both Governments.

In support of this opinion, Mr. Fox states that a similar reasoning was held on the part of the United States, when, in the year 1837, this Government remonstrated against an alleged act, or design rather, of encroachment of a less objectionable character than the operations to which he refers, namely, the survey of a projected line of railroad from Quebec to St. Andrews, passing through a part of the disputed territory, and he adds that, for the preservation of peace between the people on both sides, and of good will between the two nations, such acts as those complained of, ought to be desisted from, and the existing arrangements observed in good faith.

The President, to whom Mr. Fox's note has been communicated, has directed me to express to you his anxious desire, that no occasion should be permitted to call in question, the faithful observance by the Governments of the United States and Maine, of the arrangements referred to, a sentiment in which he is confident your Excellency will freely concur, and to request that you will transmit to this Department, such information as may be in possession of the Government of Maine, in relation to the acts referred to, in order that an appropriate answer may soon be returned to Mr. Fox's communication. I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

A. VAIL, Acting Secretary.

His Excellency JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of the State of Maine.

The Governor of Maine to the Acting Secretary of State.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Saco, November 21, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 6th instant, reciting certain complaints that have been made by the British Government, through its Minister Mr. Fox, of the authorities of this State for certain alleged proceedings on the part of the latter, in relation to "the disputed territory;" and I lose no time in complying with the request "to transmit such information as may be in the possession of the Government of Maine in relation to the acts referred to, in order that an appropriate answer may soon be returned to Mr. Fox's communication."

The first complaint is, "that the armed posse stationed by the State of Maine for the protection of the public property in the disputed territory, advancing beyond the stipulated limits, has extended its occupation of the country along the whole way from the valley of the Restook to the mouth of Fish river into the valley of the St. Johns, and thus into a portion of the Madawaska settlements."

This complaint is probably founded upon the following facts: Early last spring, the land agent of the State sent a small force, consisting of some twenty-five men, to Fish river, to disperse a band of trespassers understood to be operating at that place. The enterprise was successful. Their camps were broken up, some of the trespassers driven off, and a few, with their teams, were brought out to the settlement on the Aroostook, though subsequently released. The land agent, deeming his work but half accomplished, again sent a small force, of about the same number of men as composed the first party, to the mouth of Fish river, to extend a boom across it to prevent the timber, which had been cut by the trespassers, being driven out into the St. Johns, and to prevent further depredations by cutting. That force has remained there until the present time, and has, I believe, been signally successful in accomplishing the objects of the expedition.

This proceeding violates no stipulation ever entered into by the authorities of this State. In no proper sense can the Madawaska settlements be said to include the territory as far west as Fish river, upon either side of the St. Johns, it being a distance of some twenty-five miles above it, and the two not being connected by continuous occupations or settlements. But, supposing the Fish river territory to be a part of the Madawaska settlements, even then, I maintain, there has been no infringement of the stipulations on the part of this State, referred to by Mr. Fox. In that arrangement, negotiated through the agency of General Scott, the right was not relinquished, on the part of this State, of going any where upon the disputed territory with an armed posse for the purpose of protecting the timber then recently cut, and to prevent further depredations; but such right was expressly reserved, or rather the intention of exercising it was distinctly avowed.

So far as I am informed, the armed posse have confined their operations to the objects before stated, and have given no just cause of complaint, unless the prohibiting Colonel McLaughlin, the provincial land agent, from driving timber down the St. Johns into the province of New Brunswick, constitutes such cause. And, in regard to this, I must be permitted to say that the authorities of Maine can see no reason for making a distinction between persons attempting to drive our timber from the State into a foreign jurisdiction, whatever may be the pretence set up.

Secondly, it is alleged "that the establishments formed by persons composing the armed parties on the banks, both of the Restook and the Fish river, had assumed an aspect and character more decidedly military and more resembling a permanent national possession of the country than could be required in the civil posse of a land agent temporarily occupying it for the sole purpose of preventing trespasses. That these establishments were fortified with entrenchments and cannon, and garrisoned by a number of armed men far greater than the occasion would warrant."

The party at Fish river, as before stated, is composed of about twenty-five men—not militia or soldiers, but hired laborers. A boom has by them been thrown across the river to stop the timber in its passage down. They have erected a blockhouse near the boom, and are armed with muskets. If this assumes "an aspect and character," in the eyes of our provincial neighbors "decidedly military," we hope it is not formidable enough to create any alarm. But whether it is a force more than sufficient to protect the public property of the State from numerous bands of lawless men, grown desperate by being deprived of their accustomed plunder, and over whom their own Government seems heretofore to have had but little control, is a question which this State must be permitted to decide for itself. In such a case it would be degrading to consent that limits should be prescribed by any power whatever. If the right to protect our territory from invasion, and the public property from plunder, be clear and undeniable, no less so is the choice of means for carrying that right into effect.

Upon the Aroostook a large number of men have been employed. A boom has been extended across the river—a fortification of hewn timber erected near it—and a blockhouse and a few other more temporary buildings put up. The men stationed at what is called the Fort, say twenty-five or thirty in number, are armed with muskets, and I believe they have also two small pieces of artillery. The remainder, say one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five, have been engaged for the most part in opening roads for summer as well as winter communication, and preparing facilities for supplying the posse. How far these proceedings furnish ground for the complaints of the British Government, you will judge. That any preparations short of them would have been insufficient to protect the public property, to me seems to be clear. At all events, the complaint at the extent of this force, was hardly to have been expected from the British Government just at this moment, when a few days only have elapsed since some fifty of its own subjects, bearing the Queen's arms, and otherwise suitably equipped, headed by a veteran militia captain, made an assault in the dead of night upon that very force which is now described as "greater than the occasion would warrant."

No better justification is needed for the course which has been pursued by Maine, especially in regard to the force employed, than a reference to this case. Nor is the force of the circumstance diminished by the fact, that this attack was repulsed by the firing of but one gun; for a disposition is manifested which may not always exhibit itself in so harmless a manner. Again, the complaint at our "establishments upon the disputed territory fortified with entrenchments and cannon," would seem to come with but little show of consistency from the British Government, when it has just completed most extensive and permanent barracks upon the same territory, north of the St. Johns and is in the habit of transporting troops and munitions of war over it at their pleasure.

The third allegation is, "that a permanent State road is being constructed, leading into the valley of the Aroostook, and from thence, on the south side of the St. Johns to the Fish river, the object of which is to connect those portions of the disputed territorry with the towns of Augusta and Bangor, and other acknowledged parts of the State of Maine."

That a road commencing near Mattawamkeag point, in the county of Penobscot, extending to the Aroostook river, and thence on to the mouth of Fish river, upon the St. Johns, is in process of construction, and is even now passable the whole way with some vehicles, is certainly true. But it is not perceived why, at this particular time, it should be regarded as a cause of complaint. This is no new thing. An appropriation for this road was made by the Legislature of this State, as early as 1826; from which time it has steadily progressed, and in another year, probably, will be nearly, if not quite, completed. To say nothing of other advantages anticipated from it, it is manifest that it will afford great facilities for preventing trespasses upon the public lands; and indeed, I may say that trespassing upon the streams emptying high up upon the St. Johns, cannot be prevented without such a road. This, therefore, is no new project, got up in violation of any stipulation or understanding, to which this State has in any way been a party, or for the purpose of gaining an additional extent of possession; but is the exercise of a lawful right over that portion of the territory to which we have not only the legal title, but over which we have ever had possession and jurisdiction.

But again, may I not inquire with what propriety and consistency this complaint is made on the part of Great Britain, when she has herself constructed a permanent railroad over a large part of the territory north of the St. Johns, which, it is understood, was very thoroughly repaired the present season, and over which her subjects are constantly passing.

The last allegation is, "that land surveyors, acting under the authority of the State, are employed in marking out lots and townships within the same portion of the disputed territory, and that sales of land are being made with deeds regularly drawn under the authority of Maine."

That Maine is now managing, in the particulars mentioned, these lands upon the Aroostook, and those south of the St. Johns, in the same manner that she has been accustomed to since her separation from Massachusetts, and as that State managed them prior to that period, is true. For the last thirty years we have been occasionally surveying and lotting these lands, granting them for literary, charitable, and religious purposes, and selling in small lots to actual settlers. And has this boundary question so far advanced, it may be asked, that we cannot now do, without a remonstrance on the part of the British Government, what we have been so long in the habit of doing? Has the almost interminable negotiations—all the efforts that have been put forth—all the events that have occurred—especially the exciting events of the last year—but served to weaken our title, diminish our rights, and curtail our privileges? Sure I am that Maine will not readily adopt such a view, or quietly yield to its consequences. She has been indulging the hope that some progress made towards an acknowledgment of her rights, and the acquisition of her property had been made, and I am well persuaded she has no disposition, at the present time, to make any retrograde movement.

In compliance with your request, I have now communicated the facts upon which the complaints of the British Government are supposed to be founded. In doing it, and in the accompanying remarks, I have had no intention or desire of producing irritation, or adding, in any degree, to the excitement already existing. This subject is far too momentous, and too nearly involves the peace of the countries interested, to justify any remarks founded in passion or feeling. But it is due to the State, whose organ, upon this occasion, I am, as well as to the whole country, to speak plainly, and without disguise. And, under this solemn impression, I must say, that Maine, in my opinion, has done nothing which she was not fully justified in doing, and nothing which she will not be ready to defend with her best powers. And further, that though she has not yet taken military possession of the disputed territory, a continued disposition, on the part of the British Government, to delay a settlement of the boundary question, will not fail, in my opinion, to induce such a step, whatever may be the consequences, should she not be relieved from that responsibility by the action of the General Government.

With the most earnest desire for a just, peaceful, and speedy settlement of the question, I have the honor to subscribe myself, with high respect, your most obedient servant,

JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

A. VAIL, Esq. Acting Secretary of State.

The Governor of Maine to the President of the United States.

STATE OF MAINE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Augusta, December 23, 1839.

SIR. It having been reported to me that a large number of British troops had been stationed at Temiscouata lake, in the disputed territory, and seeing extracts from the provincial papers confirmatory of these reports, I deemed it proper to apply directly to the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, which I did by letter of the 12th instant, to ascertain whether these reports were well founded or not. His answer, under date of December 19th, I received yesterday, while on my way to this place. My letter and the reply are both herewith enclosed. It will be perceived that two companies of British troops have actually been marched into the disputed territory, and stationed at the Temiscouata lake, where it is well known extensive barracks had been previously erected. This is clearly a violation of the spirit of the agreement entered into between the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick and myself in March last, though the orders have been issued by the Governor of Lower Canada. I submit, also, whether the contingency contemplated by the act of Congress of March 3, 1839, has not occurred; whether the facts do not clearly show an invasion of the State of Maine, which the Executive Government of the United States, under the directions of the act aforesaid, as well as under the obligations of the Constitution, is bound to repel.

I may add, that I am well informed that the British Government is also erecting barracks upon both sides of the St. Johns, near the mouth of the Madawaska river, and that troops are concentrating at Grand Falls. Under all these circumstances, I deem it to be my duty to call upon the Government of the United States for that protection of this State from invasion, guarantied to her in the Constitution.

With the highest respect, I am, sir, your most obedient servant, JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

His Excellency MARTIN VAN BUREN,
President of the United States.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Saco, December 12, 1839.

SIR: Having seen in the public prints extracts from some of the provincial papers, stating that two regiments of British troops had been stationed at Temiscouata lake in the disputed territory, I have been induced to inquire of your Excellency whether there be any foundation for these reports. A movement so clearly in violation of the arrangement entered into through the mediation of General Scott, I shall not permit myself to believe your Excellency would make, without stronger evidence than a newspaper paragraph.

The extreme sensitiveness of the public mind upon this subject, I trust your Excellency will perceive, affords additional reasons for an early explanation.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, your Excellency's obedient servant,
JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

His Exc'y Maj. Gen. Sir JOHN HARVEY,
Lieut. Governor, Province of New Brunswick.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Frederickton, N. B. Dec 19, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, this day, of your Excellency's letter of the 12th instant.

Whatever movements of troops may have taken place on the side of Lower Canada, have been made by authority superior to mine, but I apprehend they have consisted, not of two regiments, but of one or two companies, (as small a detachment as can well be made to so great a distance, consistently with the maintenance of a due degree of discipline,) for the protection of certain buildings which have been constructed for the better accommodation of her Majesty's troops on their march between the upper and lower provinces, and of the provisions, stores, and other public property therein deposited.

A copy of your Excellency's letter shall be transmitted by me to the authorities in Canada, who. I can assure your Excellency, are as anxious as I am that the spirit as well as the letter of the agreement entered into between your Excellency and myself, under the mediation of Gen. Scott in March last, should be scrupulously observed on our part.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,
J. HARVEY,
Maj. Gen. Lt. Gov. New Brunswick.

His Excellency Gov. FAIRFIELD,
Saco, State of Maine.

Secretary of State to the Governor of Maine.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 2, 1840.

SIR: Your letter of the 23d ultimo, to the President, has, with its enclosures, been received and referred to this Department. The information herein contained, respecting the alleged occupation by British troops of a portion of the disputed territory, had before reached him from another quarter, and, by his direction, had immediately been made the subject of representations from this Department to the British Minister, accompanied by a request that he would communicate such information in relation to the subject as he might have in his possession, or could obtain from the British colonial authorities. Presuming that the desired information is to be procured from the last mentioned source, sufficient time has not yet been afforded for that purpose; but I am instructed by the President to state, that so soon as an answer is received from the British Minister, its purport shall be communicated to your Excellency.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your Excellency's obedient servant,
JOHN FORSYTH.

His Excellency JOHN FAIRFIELD,
Governor of Maine.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, November 2, 1839.

Information which has been reported to her Britannic Majesty's Government in England, and more recent intelligence which has been conveyed to the undersigned by the British authorities in the Province of New Brunswick, make it the duty of the undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to call the immediate and serious attention of the Government of the United States to the extensive and unscrupulous (although it is to be hoped and believed the unauthorized) acts of encroachment which continue to be carried on by the people of the State of Maine, within the line of the disputed territory.

It is unnecessary here to recapitulate the terms of the several agreements which were entered into in the months of February and March last, first between the Secretary of State of the United States and the undersigned, at Washington, and afterward between the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, the Governor of Maine, and Major General Scott, of the United States army, for the purpose of averting the danger of local collision upon the frontier, pending the final settlement of the boundary question between the Government of Great Britain and the United States. The terms of those agreements, and their true intent and meaning, are sufficiently well known. Her Majesty's authorities have, on their part, not only scrupulously adhered to the letter and spirit of the engagements referred to, but they have been desirous upon every occasion of interpreting in the most frank and liberal manner any point upon which a doubt or cavil could arise.

The undersigned, however, regrets to say that the same correct and scrupulous observance has not marked the conduct of the people of Maine, or that of the subordinate officers employed by the Government of the State.

The armed posse from the State of Maine, which it was agreed upon should be allowed to remain in the disputed territory, within certain limits, for the purpose of guarding the timber upon the disputed lands from waste and spoliation, has already advanced, it appears, far beyond those limits, extending its operations, and its armed occupation of the country, along the whole way from the valley of the Restook to the mouth of the Fish river, into the valley of the upper St. Johns, and thus into a portion of the Madawaska settlements. All this is clearly at variance with the terms and spirit of the engagements signed by the Governor of Maine, under the sanction and guarantee of Gen. Scott.

The establishments, also, which have been formed by the persons composing the armed parties, on the banks both of the Restook and of the Fish river have assumed an aspect and charactor more decidedly military, and more resembling a permanent national possession of the country, than can be either required or justified in the civil posse of a land agent, holding, for the sole purpose of preventing trespasses, the temporary occupation of a district which is claimed by two parties, and the title to which is not yet settled between them. These establishments or stations are fortified with entrenchments and with cannon; and the number of armed men composing their garrisons is far greater than the occasion can warrant. A permanent State road is also being constructed from the frontier of Maine into the valley of the Restook, and from thence on the south side of the St. Johns to the Fish river, the object of which road is to connect those portions of the disputed territory with the towns of Augusta and Bangor, and other acknowledged parts of the State of Maine.

It moreover appears that land surveyors, acting under the authority of the State of Maine, are employed in marking out lots and townships within the aforesaid portion of the disputed territory; and that sales of lands are being made, with deeds regularly drawn under the authority of the State, as if those lands, lying within a region which her Majesty's Government confidently claims to be a rightful possession of the British crown, formed, on the contrary, a recognised part of the public domain of the State of Maine.

It is true that the present course of encroachment, and the wrongful occupation of the land by the citizens of Maine, whether acting as unauthorised individuals, or with the sanction of the authorities of the State, cannot in any way place in jeopardy the eventual rights of Great Britain, for whatever shall be the line of boundary between her Majesty's possessions and the Republic of the United States, definitely recognised and decided upon by the two Governments, either through the attainment of the true line of the treaty of 1783, or through the adoption of a conventional line, her Majesty's Government will have to rely upon the Federal Government of the United States, in conjunction with the Government of her Majesty, to assert and carry out the decision, whatever may be the views and pretensions of the inhabitants of the State of Maine notwithstanding.

But it is evident that the establishment, in the mean time, of new interests, and the growing up, as it were, of new proprietary claims upon the lands which are yet in dispute, may end by embarrassing the action of both Governments; of the Government to whom the district shall be finally allotted, and of the Government which will be called upon definitely to relinquish it.

The same argument has been held, and the same principle has been contended for, by the Government of the United States no less than by the Government of Great Britain. It will be in the immediate recollection of the Government of the United States, that when, in the year 1837, an alleged act, or design rather, of encroachment, of a far less direct or objectionable character than the operations referred to in the present note, namely, the survey of a projected line of railroad from Quebec to St. Andrews, passing through a part of the disputed territory, was complained of and remonstrated against by the President, her Majesty's Government immediately consented to order that survey to be relinquished. The undersigned cannot doubt but that the Government of the United States will now, on their part, be guided by a similar and reciprocal disposition.

The undersigned, therefore, while protesting, in the first place, formally, in the name of his Government, against the acts of encroachment by the people of Maine, above enumerated and complained of, urgently, also, and for the ends of peace and good will, appeals to the Government of the United States to cause those acts of encroachment to be desisted from, in order that whenever a practical adjustment of the line of boundary shall be obtained, no minor or incidental occasions of dispute may remain to obstruct that final and friendly settlement of the controversy, which the undersigned feels persuaded it is the equally earnest desire of both Governments to accomplish.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration. H. S. FOX.

Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 24, 1839.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, having, in pursuance of directions from the President, requested the Governor of Maine to communicate to him such information as might be in his possession in relation to a complaint preferred by Mr. Fox, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, in a note dated the 2d ultimo, of alleged encroachments on the part of the State of Maine upon the territory in dispute on the Northeastern frontier of the United States, is enabled, by a recent communication from the Governor of the State, to lay before Mr. Fox, for the information of his Government, the following statements and observations:

With reference to the first ground of complaint, the undersigned is informed that, early last spring, the land agent of Maine despatched a small force, consisting of about twenty-five men, to Fish river, for the purpose of dispersing a band of trespassers understood to have been operating at that place, in consequence of which the trespassers' camps were broken up, some of them driven off, and a few, with their teams, brought to the settlement on the Aroostook, but subsequently released: that the land agent, in further pursuance of what he deemed his duty, again sent a party of about the same number of men to the mouth of Fish river, to extend a boom across it, in order to prevent the timber, which had been cut by the trespassers, from being driven out into the St. Johns, and to hinder further depredations by cutting. The object of the expedition had been accomplished, and the party remained on the ground, at the date of the Governor's communication.

So far the undersigned is unable to perceive that any thing has been done by the people of Maine, in any way contravening the spirit of the agreement entered into with Mr. Fox, or that of the arrangement proposed by General Scott, and subscribed to by the authorities of Maine and New Brunswick. In the first place, the territory contiguous to the mouth of the Fish river, on either side of the St. Johns, can, in no proper sense, be considered as included in the Madawaska settlement. It is distant some twenty-five miles above it, and the two points are not connected by any continuous occupations or settlements of the country. But even if the point referred to formed part of the Madawaska settlement, the agreement of the 27th of February stipulated that, in the event of necessity for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation, by armed force, the operation would be conducted jointly or separately, according to agreements between the Governments of Maine and New Brunswick. Under such an agreement, negotiated through the agency of General Scott, the Governor of Maine was to maintain within the disputed territory, under a land agent, a small civil posse, armed or unarmed, to protect the timber recently cut, and to prevent further depredations, without any limitation as to the sphere of its operation within the bounds of the disputed territory. To the attainment of those ends, the action of the parties detached by the Maine land agent appears, so far as the undersigned is informed, to have been strictly confined.

As to the military aspect and character alleged by Mr. Fox to have been assumed by the parties on the Restook and Fish rivers, it appears that those despatched to the last mentioned points, composed, as stated, each of about twenty-five men, neither militia nor soldiers, but hired laborers, were, it is true, armed with muskets, and had extended a boom across the river, and erected a blockhouse for its protection and their own against the numerous bands of lawless men, grown desperate by being deprived of their accustomed plunder, and over whom her Majesty's authorities appear to have exercised but little control. Such measures of precaution cannot but be regarded as dictated by prudential motives, if not by the necessity of the case, and the fitness and extent of the preparation, appear to the undersigned questions which could not understandingly be discussed away from the scene of action, and which, of necessity, can only be properly decided by those persons whose safety was to be secured.

Upon the Aroostook, which has been the pivot of the operations of the land agent's posse, a larger number of men has been employed. They have also extended a boom across the river, and erected near it a fortification of hewn timber, and a few other more temporary buildings. The twenty-five or thirty men stationed there, are likewise armed with muskets, and, it is believed, have also two small pieces of artillery. The remainder, about one hundred and twenty-five, have, for the most part, been engaged in opening roads for summer, as well as for winter, communications, and in preparing facilities for supplying the posse. Any preparations short of these, would, it is stated, have been insufficient to protect the public property: and the authorities of Maine cannot repress a sentiment of surprise, that these should now be made a subject of complaint, when, but a short time since, the establishment was assaulted by a party of some fifty men, suitably equipped, commanded by a captain of militia, and bearing the Queen's arms, in the repulsion of which the occupants displayed a spirit of forbearance and moderation sufficiently in harmony with the avowed and sole object of their occupation of the territory; and that surprise is in no way diminished by the fact that the agents of the British Government have just completed extensive and permanent barracks on the same territory, north of the St. Johns, and are in the habit of transporting troops and munitions of war over it at their convenience.

The construction of the road leading into the valley of the Aroostook, would not, it is apprehended, have been deemed, at this time, a just cause of complaint, had Mr. Fox adverted to the fact that the work was commenced as long ago as 1826, under an appropriation by the Legislature of the State of Maine, and that from that time it has steadly advanced, so that another year will probably see it completed, from near Mattawamkeag Point, in the county of Penobscot, to the Aroostook river, and thence to the mouth of Fish river, on the St. Johns. It is, therefore, no new project, conflicting with any existing arrangement, nor with any understanding to which the State of Maine has become a party, but the exercise of a lawful right over a portion of the territory in dispute, of and over which it ever has had possession and jurisdiction. To say nothing of other advantages anticipated from the completion of the road, it will afford great facilities for preventing trespasses upon the public lands; and, indeed, it is considered that trespassing upon the streams emptying high up upon the St. Johns, cannot be prevented without such a road.

The Governor of Maine considers, that, in carrying on the work referred to, the State has done no more that is inconsistent with the respective rights of the parties, than have the authorities of her Majesty's province, in constructing, and, recently, as it is understood, in thoroughly repairing a permanent mail road over a large portion of the territory north of the St. Johns.

The last allegation in Mr. Fox's note, forming a cause of complaint against the State of Maine relates to her management of the lands upon the Aroostook. In this particular, the undersigned is enabled to observe that the proceedings complained of differ, in no way, from those which Maine, since her separation from Massachusetts, and the last named State previously to it, have ever pursued in regard to the public lands. For the last thirty years the State has been occasionally surveying and lotting those lands, granting them for literary, charitable, and religious purposes, and selling them in small lots to actual settlers. Of this right, so long exercised, Maine alleges that she has done nothing to divest herself, and that the discussions and negotiations upon the Maine question of boundary could not have had the effect of weakening her title to rights she had so long been in the habit of enjoying.

It is with no little surprise that, in the face of the complaints, which form the subject of Mr. Fox's note, the President has received intelligence of her Majesty's colonial authorities having recently stationed a regiment of regular troops, part at the north, and part at the south end of Lake Temiscouata and of her Majesty's forces having commenced building barracks on both sides of the St. Johns, at its confluence with the Madawaska. Such proceedings on the part of the agents of the British Government would, if true, constitute such a flagrant contravention to the existing understanding between the parties, that the President cannot but hope that the report which has reached him of the occupation referred to, is founded upon incorrect information.

The undersigned requests that Mr. Fox will communicate to him such information, if any, as he may have in his possession in relation to the subject, and that he will, by such representations as the circumstances, if founded in fact, will obviously suggest, impress her Majesty's colonial authorities with a sense of the inexpediency and imprudence of such proceedings, and of the unhappy consequences likely to attend their persistence therein.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Fox the assurance of his distinguished consideration. JOHN FORSYTH.

HENRY S. FOX, esq. &c. &c. &c.

Mr Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 12, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the official note addressed to him by the Secretary of State of the United States, on the 24th of December, in reply to a previous note, which, by direction of his Government, the undersigned had addressed to the Secretary of State on the 2d of November, in relation to various and continued acts of encroachment committed by the authorities and inhabitants of the State of Maine, within that tract of territory on the Northeastern frontier of the United States, the true title to the possession of which, according to the terms of the treaty of 1783, is at present in dispute between the British and American Governments.

The undersigned has lost no time in transmitting to her Majesty's Government the official note of the Secretary of State. He has, in the meantime, to express his extreme regret that the explanations furnished by the authorities of the State of Maine, and communicated to the undersigned by the Secretary of State, in relation to the encroachments complained of, both as regards the construction of roads and public works, and the sale and alienation of lands, are of a character which must render them altogether unsatisfactory to the Government of Great Britain. It would appear, in fact, as if a reference by the General Government to the authorities of Maine, of the complaints preferred by Great Britain, had produced no other reply or explanation from the authorities of Maine, than a reiteration of their intention to persist in the commission of the acts complained of, whether in accordance with the obligations of international justice or not.

The undersigned does not permit himself to relinquish the hope that, through the wisdom and integrity of the General Government of the United States, in unison with the sincere endeavors of her Majesty's Government, it will still be found possible to bring the pending controversy of the disputed boundary to a satisfactory and amicable conclusion; but it is certain that the public acts, and public declarations of the authorities of Maine, are continually calculated, as far as in them lies, to render such amicable conclusion more difficult and more distant.

With reference to the concluding part of the official note of the Secretary of State, wherein observations are made upon certain reported movements of British troops in the neighborhood of Lake Temiscouata, and at other points within that portion of the territory where, according to the provisional agreements entered into at the beginning of last year, no interference was to be attempted, with the exercise of British authority, pending the negotiation of the boundary question, the undersigned can distinctly assure the Secretary of State that there exists no intention on the part of her Majesty's authorities to cancel or infringe the terms of those provisional engagements, so long as the same are observed with fidelity by the other party.

The particular motives, and the amount of the present movement of troops, have been explained in a frank and satisfactory manner to the Governor of Maine by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in a correspondence which has been made public, and which, it appears, has been officially communicated by the Governor of Maine to the President of the United States.

With regard, however, generally to the reinforcement of military posts, and other defensive and precautionary measures, whether along the confines of the disputed territory, or within that portion of it where, according to the provisional agreements before cited, the authority of Great Britain was not to be interfered with, the undersigned has to observe that the adoption of such measures by her Majesty's authorities cannot be, with reason, objected to or complained of by the Government of the United States, when regard is had to the reports which have for some time past been circulated, (and of the prevalence and consistency of those reports the United States Government are themselves fully aware,) respecting the probable intention of the Legislature of the State of Maine to revoke, during its present session, the provisional agreements now in force, and to authorise some new and extensive act of aggression over the stipulated territory. And the undersigned has regretted to observe that the language of the Governor of Maine, in his recent message to the Legislature, at the opening of the session, is calculated to encourage rather than to restrain such rash and obnoxious designs.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to repeat to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration. H. S. FOX.

The Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Jan. 16, 1840.

In a note which Mr. Fox, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, addressed on the 12th instant to the undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Fox, alluding to a complaint made by the undersigned of certain reported movements of British troops in portions of the territory in dispute between the two countries, disclaims all intention on the part of the British authorities to cancel or infringe the terms of the provisional agreement entered into at the beginning of last year; and this disclaimer is connected with an assumption of the right of Great Britain to streng hen posts, and take measures of (mi itary) precaution, not along the line only, but within portions of the disputed territory, as, by the terms of the agreements referred to, no interference was to be attempted pending the negotiation of the boundary question, with the exercise of British authority in the neighborhood of Lake Temiscouata, "and at o her points" within a portion of the territory supposed to be embraced in the terms of the arrangements. Mr. Fox having stated that he has referred to his Government the representations of the United States against the military movements alluded to, the undersigned, under a confident expectation that the matter will present itself to the minds of her Majesty's ministers in a light different from that which it is understood by Mr. Fox, would have refrained from any further remarks on the subject, but in order to obviate the risk of any misapprehension as to the views of the President concerning it, and inasmuch as the ground assumed by Mr. Fox with respect to the import of the existing arrangements would, if admitted by the United States, give to those arrangements a scope not authorised by the language in which they are expressed, nor by what is believed to be the intention of the parties, it is proper that the undersigned should call Mr. Fox's immediate attention to the express provisions of the agreement signed by him and the undersigned, and of that which was subscribed to, under the agency of General Scott, by the Governor of Maine and the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

The main object of those agreements obviously was the restoration and future maintenance of tranquillity in the disputed territory; and as the means of most surely attaining that object, the entire exclusion from its limits of all military force, to whichever side belonging, and the delegation to the civil authority exclusively, of the exercise of all power and jurisdiction. With that view, under the first mentioned of those agreements, it was only in case of necessity for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation, that armed force was to be employed on either side, and then the operation was to be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreement between the Governments of Maine and New Brunswick. The other was the result of the contemplated "concert" between the Governments of Maine and New Brunswick; was intended to carry out the object of the first, confiding to the State of Maine the duty of protecting the timber recently cut, and of preventing further depredations, and prescribed that these objects were to be accomplished through the agency of a civil posse. Accordingly, the Governor of Maine engaged to withdraw, without unnecessary delay, the military force of the State. Without regard, therefore, to the limits within which either party had before exercised jurisdiction, resort to military force, for any purpose whatever, was interdicted to both parties. With reference to the extent of territory within which each party was to continue to exercise jurisdiction, the first agreement left the question of right where it had before stood, and only expressed the conflicting understanding of that question by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, respectively. The agreement between Governor Fairfield and Sir John Harvey provided, likewise, that the question of possession and jurisdiction should remain as it then stood; but stated where it stood, by providing that Great Britain was to continue holding, in fact, possession of a part of the territory, meaning that part embraced in the Madawaska settlements, in the occupancy of which, as well as in the enjoyment of the usual communications between New Brunswick and her Majesty's upper provinces, the Governor of Maine disclaimed all intentions of disturbing the British authorities. Beyond the Madawaska settlements, therefore, circumscribed by the limits within which they stood at the date of the agreement, the United States cannot, under the terms of that agreement, recognise in the British authorities the right of extending jurisdiction, much less that of forming any military establishments beyond or within them; and those, consequently, which formed the subject of the representations in the note of the undersigned of the 12th of December, pushed, as they are alleged to have been, into tracts of country far beyond any acknowledged limits of those settlements, and wholly unconnected with them, cannot be viewed in any other light than a bold infraction of existing arrangements. That such is a just view of the agreements, cannot be disputed by Great Britain, as her Majesty's Government has adopted and acted upon it. In the note of Mr. Fox complaining of the encroachments on the part of Maine, and of an armed occupation of part of the disputed territory by that State, both are treated as inconsistent with the existing arrangements; and it is presumed her Majesty's Government will not attempt to apply one rule of construction to defend the military movements of its colonial authorities, and another to sustain complaints against the State Government, for acts which are not founded upon any apprehended necessity of the use of a regular military force for offensive or defensive purposes. Nor can it be imagined that it will be contended that those arrangements ar not perfectly reciprocal, or that there is any difference in the character and the extent of the jurisdiction to be exercised by Great Britain in one portion, and that by the State of Maine or the United States in the other portion, of the disputed territory, comprehended within the temporary arrangements made to preserve tranquillity in both, and guard against any hostile collision between the State and colonial governments.

The undersigned having laid Mr. Fox's note before the President, is instructed to state to him, that no reason is perceived for doubting the disposition of the Governor of Maine scrupulously to adhere to the spirit of the existing arrangements, and to avoid all acts tending to render more difficult and distant the final adjustment of the main question of boundary between the two countries; but, in repeating assurances of the readiness of the United States Government to contribute, by all means in its power, to an amicable termination of the difference, the undersigned is bound to declare that a persistence in, or a repetition of, such acts, on the part of her Majesty's agents, as those now complained of, would, if avowed by Great Britain, be considered as but little in accordance with those assurances.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Fox the expression of his distinguished consideration. JOHN FORSYTH.

HENRY S. FOX, esq. &c. &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
January 22, 1840.

SIR: In reply to that portion of the resolution of the Senate, referred by your direction to this Department by the Secretary of State, which requests you "to communicate to the Senate, so far as may not be incompatible with the public interest, whether any, and if any, what measures have been taken under the act of Congress of March, 1839, or otherwise, to cause the removal or expulsion of the British troops, which have taken possession of a portion of the territory of Maine, claimed by Great Britain, and especially whether, since the last session of Congress, any military posts have been established in Maine, or any other military measures adopted, preparatory to a just vindication of the honor and rights of the nation and of Maine, as connected with the persevering claim made by Great Britain to a portion of the territory of that State;" I have the honor to state, that the circumstance of a portion of the territory of Maine claimed by Great Britain having been occupied by British troops, was recently communicated to the Government, and having been made the subject of remonstrance, and become a matter of discussion between the two Governments, no measures of a character referred to by the resolution have been taken, either under the act of Congress of March, 1839, or otherwise.

A careful military reconnoisance of the undisputed boundary of the State of Maine, was made in 1838, and the result submitted to the Senate during the last session of Congress; but as no appropriation was made for the erection of fortifications on the sites selected for that purpose, none were commenced; and as is fully set forth in your last annual message to Congress, it did not appear, that the contingency contemplated by the act alluded to, had occurred, no military measures whatever were deemed necessary, or were adopted.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, five thousands additional copies were ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, relative to the operations for increasing the depth of water at the mouth of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the memorial of the heirs at law of John De Treville, a captain in the Revolutionary army, for commutation; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the memorial of certain manufacturers of wool, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to, and it was laid on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY presented the petition of Thos.

Elliott; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of John Nantz; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the memorial of E. L. A. Ripley; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying an appropriation for a steam revenue cutter for the Delaware bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, the petition and papers of John Caldwell, now on file, were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SEVIER, at the instance of the Delegate from Wisconsin, presented the petition of Robert Grignon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the fifteenth annual report on the Louisville and Portland Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Lewis Gordon; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin, asking for aid to erect a penitentiary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill creating an additional land office in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of John Whitehead and others, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of Nathaniel Gunnison, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. TAPPAN said he wished to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, on a subject in which the citizens of the District were greatly interested. He would inquire whether that committee intended at an early day to introduce a bill for the renewal of the charters of the banks in the District.

Mr. MERRICK said that the committee had not yet taken the subject under their consideration, and, of course, he could not say what would be their course, when they considered the subject. Some of the banks had not yet applied for a renewal of their charters, and there were no memorials from the citizens of the District on the subject. It was, therefore, not probable that the committee would report a bill at an early day.

Mr. TAPPAN said that, under these circumstances, he would give notice, that at an early day, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to regulate the issue and circulation of bank paper in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Henry J. Pickering, reported the same without amendment, and said that he was instructed by the Committee, when it came up under consideration, to move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be so modified as to admit on the floor of the Senate the District Attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, and the Reporter for the Supreme Court.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The following bill was taken up for consideration, the question being on its passage:

A BILL to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, there shall be prepared and provided, within the new Treasury building now erecting at the seat of Government, suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, his assistants and clerks; and sufficient and secure fireproof vaults and safes, for the keeping of the public moneys in the possession and under the immediate control of the said Treasurer; which said rooms, vaults, and safes, are hereby constituted and declared to be, the Treasury of the United States. And the said Treasurer of the United States shall keep all the public moneys which shall come to his hands in the Treasury of the United States, as hereby constituted, until the same are drawn therefrom according to law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Mint of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, and the Branch Mint, in the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and the vaults and safes thereof, respectively, shall be places of deposite and safe keeping of the public moneys at those points respectively; and the Treasurer of the said Mint and Branch Mint respectively, for the time being, shall have the custody and care of all public moneys deposited within the same, and shall perform all the duties required to be performed by them, in reference to the receipt, safe keeping, transfer and disbursements of all such moneys, according to the provisions hereinafter contained.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be prepared and provided, within the custom-houses now erecting in the city of New York, in the State of New York, and in the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the receivers-general of public moneys, hereinafter directed to be appointed, at those places, respectively; and sufficient and secure fireproof vaults and safes for the keeping of the public moneys collected and deposited with them, respectively; and receivers-general of public money, from time to time, appointed at those points, shall have the custody and care of the said rooms, vaults, and safes, respectively, and of all the public moneys deposited within the same; and shall perform all the duties required to be performed by them, in reference to the receipt, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of all such moneys, according to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be erected, prepared, and provided, at the expense of the United States, at the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, and at the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, offices, with suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the receivers-general of public money hereinafter directed to be appointed at the places above named; and sufficient and secure fireproof vaults and safes for the keeping of the public money collected and deposited at those points respectively; and the said receivers-general, from time to time appointed at those places, shall have the custody and care of the said offices, vaults, and safes, so to be erected, prepared, and provided, and of all the public moneys deposited within the same; and shall perform all the duties required to be performed by them, in reference to the recept, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of all such moneys, according to the provisions hereinafter contained.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint four officers, to be denominated 'receivers-general of public money," which said officers shall hold their respective offices for the term of four years, unless sooner removed therefrom; one of which shall be located at the city of New York, in the State of New York; one other of which shall be located at the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts; one other of which shall be located at the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina; and the remaining one of which shall be located at the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri; and all of which said officers shall give bonds to the United States, with sureties, according to the provisions hereinafter contained, for the faithful discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the Treasurers and those acting as such, of the various Branch Mints, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs acting also as collectors, all receivers-general of public moneys, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, and all postmasters, except as is hereinafter particularly provided, be, and they are hereby, required to keep safely, without loaning or using, all the public money collected by them, or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered by the proper Department or officer of the Government to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the Government, which may be imposed by this or any other acts of Congress, or by any regulation of the Treasury Department, made in conformity to law; and also to do and perform all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the Executive Departments of the Government, as agents for paying pensions, or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of those Departments may be required by law to make, and which are of a character to be made by the depositaries hereby constituted, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon them.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans, and the receivers-general of public money hereinbefore directed to be appointed, shall, respectively, give bonds to the United States, in such form, and for such amounts, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the President, with sureties to the satisfaction of the Solicitor of the Treasury; and shall, from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase their official bonds, as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the consent of the President, may direct; any law in reference to any of the official bonds of any of the said officers to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at as early a day as possible after the passage of this act, to require from the several depositaries hereby constituted, and whose official bonds are not hereinbefore provided for, to execute bonds new and suitable in their terms to meet the new and increased duties imposed upon them respectively by this act, and with sureties, and in sums such as shall seem reasonable and safe to the Solicitor of the Treasury, and from time to time to require such bonds to be renewed and increased in amount and strengthened by new sureties, to meet any increasing responsibility which may grow out of accumulations of money in the hands of the depositary, or out of any other duty or responsibility arising under this or any other law of Congress.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all collectors and receivers of public money, of every character and description, within the District of Columbia, shall, as frequently as they may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Postmaster General, so to do, pay over to the Treasurer of the United States at the Treasury thereof, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of Philadelphia and New Orleans, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the Treasurers of the Mints in their respective cities, at the said Mints, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; and that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the receivers-general of public money in their respective cities, at their offices respectively, all the public moneys collected by them, or in their hands, to be safely kept by the said respective depositaries, until otherwise disposed of according to law; and it shall be the duty of the said Secretary and Postmaster General to direct such payments, by the said collectors and receivers, at all the said places, at least as often as once in each week, and as much more frequently, in all cases, as they, in their discretion, may think proper.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary hereby constituted, to the Treasury of the United States; to the Mint at Philadelphia; to the Branch Mint at New Orleans; or to the offices of either of the receivers-general of public moneys, by this act directed to be appointed; to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary constituted by this act to any other depositary constituted by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require; which authority to transfer the moneys belonging to the Post Office Department is also hereby conferred upon the Postmaster General so far as its exercise by him may be consistent with the provisions of existing laws; and every depositary constituted by this act shall keep his account of the money paid to or deposited with him, belonging to the Post Office Department separate and distinct from the account kept by him of other public moneys so paid or deposited. And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the moneys in the hands, care, and custody, of any of the depositaries constituted by this act, shall be considered and held as deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be, at all times, subject to his draft, whether made for transfer or disbursement, in the same manner as though the said moneys were actually in the Treasury of the United States; and each depositary shall make returns to the Treasury and Post Office Department of all moneys received and paid by him, at such times, and in such form, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Postmaster General.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause examinations to be made of the books, accounts, and money on hand, of the several depositaries constituted by this act; and for that purpose to appoint special agents, as occasion may require, with such compensation as he may think reasonable, to be fixed and declared at the time of each appointment. The agents selected to make these examinations shall be instructed to examine as well the books, accounts, and returns of the officer, as the money on hand, and the manner of its being kept, to the end that uniformity and accuracy in the accounts, as well as safety to the public moneys, may be secured thereby.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the examinations provided for in the last preceding section, and as a further guard over the public moneys, it shall be the duty of each naval officer and surveyor, as a check upon the receiver-general of public moneys, or collector of the customs, of their respective districts; of each register of a land office, as a check upon the receiver of his land office; and of the director and superintendent of each Mint and Branch Mint when seperate offices, as a check upon the Treasurers, respectively, of the said Mints, or the persons acting as such, at the close of each quarter of the year, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to do so, to examine the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand, of the receivers-general of public money, collectors, receivers of land offices, treasurers, and persons acting as such, and to make a full, accurate, and faithful return to the Treasury Department of their condition.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said officers respectively whose duty it is made by this act to receive, keep and disburse the public moneys, as the fiscal agents of the Government, may be allowed any necessary additional expenses for clerks, fireproof chests, or vaults, or other necessary expenses of safe keeping, transferring, and disbursing said moneys; all such expenses of every character to be first expressly authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose directions upon all the above subjects, by way of regulation and otherwise, so far as authorized by law, are to be strictly followed by all the said officers: Provided, That the whole number of clerks to be appointed by virtue of this section of this act, shall not exceed ten, and that the aggregate compensations of the whole number shall not exceed eight thousand dollars, nor shall the compensation of any one clerk, so appointed, exceed eight hundred dollars per annum.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, with as much promptitude as the convenience of the public business, and the safety of the public funds will permit, withdraw the balances remaining with the present depositaries of the public moneys, and confine the safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of those moneys to the depositaries established by this act.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted. That all marshals, district attorneys, and others, having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees, wishing to make payment for patents to be issued, may pay all such moneys to the Treasurer of the United States, at the Treasury, to the Treasurer of either of the Mints, in Philadelphia or New Orleans, to either of the receivers general of public money, or to each other depositary constituted by this act as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in other parts of the United States, to receive such payments, and give receipts or certificates of deposite therefor.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That all officers charged by this act with the safe keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public moneys, others than those connected with the Post Office Department, are hereby required to keep an accurate entry of each sum received, and of the kind of money in which it is received, and of each payment or transfer, and of the kind of currency in which it is made; and that if any one of the said officers or of those connected with the Post Office Department, shall convert to his own use; in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys, intrusted to him for safe keeping, disbursement, transfer or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a felony, and any officer or agent of the United States, and all persons adivsing or participating in such act, being convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That until the rooms, offices, vaults, and safes, directed by the first four sections of this act to be constructed and prepared for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurers of the Mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, and the receivers-general of public money at New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, can be constructed and prepared for use, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to procure suitable rooms for offices for those officers at their respective locations, and to contract for such use of vaults and safes as may be required for the safe keeping of the public moneys in the charge and custody of those officers respectively, the expense to be paid by the United States.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty, the resolution of Congress of the thirtieth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, so far as it authorizes the receipt in payment of duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts and sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the notes of specie paying banks, shall be so modified as that one-fourth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money accruing or becoming due to the United States, shall be collected in the legal currency of the United States; and from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, one other fourth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, one other fourth part of all such duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts, and sums of money, shall be so collected; and that from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, the remaining fourth part of the said duties, taxes, sales of public lands, debts and sums of money, shall be also collected in the legal currency of the United States; and from and after the last mentioned day, all sums accruing, or becoming payable to the United States, for duties, taxes, sales of public lands, or other debts, and also all sums due for postages, or otherwise, to the General Post Office Department, shall be paid in gold and silver only.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, which will be in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, every officer or agent engaged in making disbursements on account of the United States, or of the General Post Office, shall make all payments in gold and silver coin only; and any receiving or disbursing officer, or agent, who shall neglect, evade, or violate the provisions of this and the last preceding section of this act, shall, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be immediately reported to the President of the United States, with the facts of such neglect, evasion, or violation, and also to Congress, if in session, and, if not in session, at the commencemeat of its session next after the violation takes place.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That no exchange of funds shall be made by any disbursing officers, or agents, of the Government, of any grade or denomination whatsoever, or connected with any branch of the public service, other than an exchange for gold and silver; and every such disbursing officer, when the means for his disbursements are furnished to him in currency legally receivable under the provisions of this act, shall make his payments in the currency so furnished, or when those means are furnished to him in drafts, shall cause those drafts to be presented at their place of payment and properly paid according to the law, and shall make his payments in the currency so received for the drafts furnished, unless, in either case, he can exchange the means in his hands for gold and silver at par, and so as to facilitate his payments, or otherwise accommodate the public service and promote the circulation of a metallic currency: And it shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of the head of the proper Department immediately to suspend from duty any disbursing officer who shall violate the provisions of this section, and forthwith to report the name of the officer, or agent, to the President, with the fact of the violation and all the circumstances accompanying the same and within the knowledge of the said Secretary, to the end that such officer, or agent, may be promptly removed from office, or restored to his trust and the performance of his duties, as to the President may seem just and proper.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make or continue in force, any general order, which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the funds or medium of payment in which debts or dues accruing to the United States may be paid.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable, and to prescribe the time, according to the different distances of the depositaries from the seat of Government, within which all drafts upon them, respectively, shall be presented for payment; and, in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper.

But in all those regulations and directions it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to guard, as far as may be, against those drafts being used, or thrown into circulation, as a paper currency or medium of exchange.

SEC 24. And be it further enacted, That the receivers-general of public moneys directed by this act to be appointed, shall receive, respectively, the following salaries, per annum, to be paid quarter yearly, at the Treasury of the United States, to wit: the receiver general of public money at New York shall be paid a salary of four thousand dollars per annum; the receiver-general of public money at Boston shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; the receiver-general of public money at Charleston shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and the receiver-general of public money at St. Louis, shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; the Treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia shall, in addition to his present salary, receive five hundred dollars annually for the performance of the duties imposed by this act; the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans shall also receive one thousand dollars annually for the additional duties created by this act; and these salaries, respectively, shall be in full for the services of the respective officers, nor shall either of them be permitted to charge, or receive, any commission, pay, or perquisite, for any official service, of any character or description whatsoever; and the making of any such charge, or the receipt of any such compensation, is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, for which the officer convicted thereof, before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be subject to punishment by fine, or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court before which the offence shall be tried.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive at the Treasury, and at such other points as he may designate, payments in advance for public lands, the payments so made, in all cases, to be evidenced by the receipt of the said Treasurer of the United States; which receipts so given shall be receivable for public lands, at any public or private sale of lands, in the same manner as the currency authorized by law to be received in payment for the public lands: Provided, however, That the receipts given by the Treasurer of the United States, pursuant to the authority conferred in this section, shall not be negotiable or transferable, by delivery, or assignment, or in any other manner whatsoever, but shall, in all cases, be presented in payment for lands by or for the person to whom the receipt was given, as shown upon its face.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That for the purchase of sites, and for the construction of the offices of the receivers-general of public money, by this act directed to be erected at Charleston, South Carolina, and at St. Louis, Missouri, there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby required to adopt plans for the said offices, and the vaults and safes connected therewith, and to cause the same to be constructed and prepared for use with as little delay as shall be consistent with the public interests, and the convenient location and security of the buildings to be erected: Provided, however, That if the Secretary of the Treasury shall find, upon inquiry and examination, that suitable rooms for the use of the receiver-general at Charleston can be obtained in the custom-house now owned by the United States at that place, and that secure vaults and safes can be constructed in that building for the safe keeping of the public money, then he shall cause such rooms to be prepared and fitted up, and such vaults and safes to be constructed in the custom-house at Charleston, and no independent office shall be there erected.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That, for the payment of the expenses authorized by this act, other than those herein before provided for, a sufficient sum of money be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts which come in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HENDERSON opposed the bill at great length.

Mr. TAPPAN said that he was desirous of expressing his opinions on the bill, but if it was the wish of the Senate to take the question on its passage now, he would not interpose. If it was intended, however, to continue the debate, he would yield the floor to any gentleman who wished to address the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, then rose and submitted his reasons for voting against the bill.

Mr. MERRICK said he intended to address the Senate on this measure, but as it was now late, being a quarter past three o'clock, he moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays being demanded, the question was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 21.

Mr. MERRICK then proceeded to address the Senate in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate as to whether the question should be taken on the passage of the bill this evening, moved that the Senate adjourn.

The ayes and noes being demanded, the question was decided in the negative—ayes 18, noes 23.

Mr. MERRICK then concluded his remarks, and was followed by Mr. DAVIS, also in opposition to the bill.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 24, noes 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Betts, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, White, and Young—18.

So the bill was passed.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 23, 1840.

The question before the House was the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina to amend the rules, by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon.

And the proposition of Mr. ADAMS, as a substitute for the above, in the following words:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the Speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the membr objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, shall the petition be rejected? and no petition shall be rejected but by a majority of the members present."

Mr. HUNT, who was entitled to the floor, was about proceeding, but was interrupted by

Mr. COOPER, of Pennsylvania, who offered a resolution, which he hoped the House would, by general consent, agree to receive, as it would, under the rule, lie on the table for one day. The resolution to which he had reference was that already published, calling on the Postmaster General for information in relation to the mail arrangement between Baltimore and New York.

Objection was made to its reception.

Mr. HUNT said he was not prepared to yield the floor for any proposition which would cause debate, and deprive him of it.

Mr. SERGEANT asked the consent of the House to make a report on a bill from the Judiciary Committee. It was a bill to correct some errors in the census law, and of the utmost importance.

Objection was made to its reception; when

Mr. SERGEANT moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. HUNT said he could not consent to any proposition which would deprive him of the floor, after so much difficulty in obtaining it.

Mr. HUNT, after thanking the House for the courtesy it extended to him by the adjournment on yesterday, on account of his indisposition, said that the best return he could make for it was his promise to be very brief. He then proceeded to discuss the proposition before the House. The principles involved in the question were of the utmost importance. It was a more important question than any which had occupied the attention of that House since the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Constitution. He was utterly opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and also to Mr. ADAMS's substitute therefor, in the present aspect of the case. The reasons were, that it was proposed to make it a permanent rule of the House; and because he was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. CHINN,] which was almost identical with that offered by himself four years ago. He hoped the time would arrive to move that again—if not at this session, at least at the next. He was in favor of Mr. C's proposition, because it did not go to make a permanent rule of the House, to operate unjustly on one class of petitions. He feared the other propositions would operate to degrade the moral question involved in the subject before the House, to subserve or satisfy party ends. His objection to the propositions in their present form was founded on the very rules of the House, because they came in conflict with the rule which makes it the duty of the Speaker, after reading of the journals, to call the States for petitions, beginning with the State of Maine, until all the States had been called. The rules had already, he believed, fully provided for the disposition of all classes of petitions. Mr. H. said he would not on these propositions, and at that time, enter into the discussion of, or argue the question of the constitutional right of petition. He considered that subject as far beyond the powers of that House to restrict or abridge as did Southern gentlemen question the power of that House to discuss the question of the sublime merits of slavery. The right of petition, in its most unlimited form, did not depend on the Constitution for its existence, but was an inherent right, above that instrument, and could not be restricted there—it was a right not secured by parchments and seals; but was one which was derived from the Author of all good, which was permitted to be exercised from infancy to old age. It was one given by God to man, which rides over all constitutions. He would ask, what Virginia, the mother of States, would say to the restriction of this right now, when, at her instance, this admirable clause had been inserted in the Constitution to protect that right: "That Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prevent the free exercise thereof, or abolish the freedom of the press, or of speech, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances." Mr. H. referred to the history of the times that carried the adoption of this amendment, which was founded upon the proceedings of George the Third, in breaking up legislative bodies, because of the exercise of this right of petition, and other examples of arbitrary rule by Great Britain. He adverted to the jealousy of Virginia's sons—caused by the proceedings of those times—to Patrick Henry, Jefferson, Madison, and other prominent men, who were the advocates of this right in its broadest sense

He congratulated the country now that Virginia had insisted upon the introduction of that clause into the Constitution; not because he believed there was an iota of force added to it. Mr. H did not deny that that House had the inherent right to reject such petitions as were offensive to the body, but he believed that it was not authorized to reject even those which were indecorous or insulting in their character, without assigning reasons on its journal therefor. Mr. H. did not think he could add any strength to what had already been said as to this right, but he would say to the North and to the South, permit the debate to go on—let every man on that floor express his individual sentiments—give the question a fair and full discussion, and the country would lose nothing by it ultimately. An attempt had been already made to stifle debate, but was prevented by one vote only, for which result he was thankful, because he believed the question was paramount in interest to all others.

The House had done, in spite of itself, an act of justice by refusing the previous question; it had afforded the gentleman from Massachusetts, and others, an opportunity to put themselves right before the country. If nothing else had been gained, it was worth the time and expense which it had incurred to do justice to that gentleman, [Mr. ADAMS.]

Upon this question (he said) the North might be reasoned with, but could not be driven. It possessed too much of the Anglo-Saxon blood. The North, when but a child in its swaddling clothes, had so told old Mother England when she disregarded the sacred right of petition, and endeavored to spurn their prayers for a redress of grievances. The question had been discussed in many of the leading journals as a party question. He denied that it was—or that it could be—it was of too grave and important a nature to be dandled with by party. He then went into a history of how far the attempt had been made to make it a party question, and contended that there were men of both parties belonging to the Abolitionists.

Mr. H. then referred to the opinions of prominent men from Virginia upon the subject, to show that Congress had some power over the question; and particularly to John Randolph, who, he said, had introduced a resolution denouncing the traffic in slaves in this District as most inhuman, and proposed the appointment of a committee to inquire into the subject, which was passed sub silentio.

Mr. H. referred to the influence which the literature of the present day was exercising over this subject. It was a tremendous influence—such that the House could not longer delay to notice. The American nation is denounced in the slavery publications throughout the civilized world, for permitting the existence of the institution of slavery among us; and he thought it, therefore, no time to blink the question. It was better to meet it now, than refer it to their posterity.

Mr. H. believed, but for the interference of bar-room politicians in exciting prejudices against the abolition societies, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, would, before many years, have ceased to be slave States; but this has thrown them back.

Mr. H. thought the best remedy to get rid of the growing and pressing evil of this question on the Government, would be to have free discussion, leave truth free to combat error, to let every gentleman come up and testify fully. He, for one, would be willing to refer the whole subject untrammelled to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and, his head for it, he would, in less than two weeks, put the subject to rest. Give to his constituents reasons why the subject of slavery should not be touched—treat them fairly—not tinker with the question for party purposes—meet it like men, was all that was wanted. He believed sincerely that the pen of that gentleman, by way of report, would settle the question of Abolition forever.

It had been said that the subject had already been referred and reported upon, without having any effect in allaying the excitement upon this question. The report of Mr. Pinckney in 1836, had been referred to as evidence. He knew something of the history of that report. That committee was gagged with instructions which went to whitewash the question, and hoodwink the American people. It was, in fact, a fraud upon the right of petition. Mr. H. could not himself vote for the resolutions of that committee, and was prevented from so amending them as to enable him to do so, but was gagged by the previous question. Because he would not vote for those resolutions, under the circumstances, he had been denounced as an Abolitionist by the official organ. Mr. H. did not believe the North had any right to interfere with the question of domestic slavery; and he did not blame Maryland and Virginia—the States that ceded this District—because they had told the North they had no right to interfere. They had done as he would have done. He was opposed to any interference until these ceding States make the first movement for the abolition of slavery. He believed sincerely that the ceding States had been driven back fifty years on the question of emancipation, in consequence of the imprudence of a portion of the North; and as a representative, in part, of the Empire State, and of the North, he would never vote for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia without the consent of those States. Mr. H. concluded at 3 o'clock.

Mr. BYNUM rose and claimed the floor, which, having been awarded to him by the SPEAKER,

Mr. HABERSHAM, who rose nearly at the same time, claimed that he had priority. He thought (he said) it was the rule of the House that when two members rose together, the one who rose from his seat had the preference to the floor over him who rose in the aisle. Now, he was under the impression that the gentleman from North Carolina rose from the aisle; and as he (Mr. H.) had been two months here without having been able to get the floor once, he hoped it would now be awarded to him.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Georgia was mistaken. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] rose from his seat, and his voice was first heard by the CHAIR. He was, therefore, entitled to the floor.

Mr. BYNUM addressed the House at some length, in a very eloquent speech, in which he laid open the designs of the Abolitionists, and those who supported them in that House. He had been opposed, he said, to the character of this debate from the commencement, and in its incipient steps he made an effort to prevent what had since taken place; but that effort was discountenanced and censured from a quarter that he least expected. It appeared that there was a party in the House determined to enter into this discussion and to carry it on, notwithstanding the consequent delay of the public business and the injury it would occasion; and, so far as his humble opinion went, it had been carried on much to the prejudice of one section of the country, and entirely to the prejudice of the party by whom it was encouraged. No man who was not blind to the scenes that were passing around him but must believe that this was the most momentous question that ever agitated the country. He believed sincerely that this was the very question—the very rock on which our glorious vessel of State was in danger of perishing. No gentleman who was possessed of the most ordinary comprehension with respect to what was passing here, and what was going on abroad, but had seen that consequences must result from the continued agitation of this subject, which would shake the very foundations of our Government. Mr. B. continued, drawing a vivid picture of the dangers to be apprehended from the designs of the Abolitionists, and showing how these Northern gentlemen who claimed to be so friendly to the South, and who professed to oppose any interference with its internal concerns, gave their support and countenance on that floor. Under color of supporting the sacred right of petition, they encouraged the introduction into the House of incendiary papers, calculated to operate with peculiar mischief in a certain quarter; even their very speeches, professedly intended only to advocate that implied privilege, were calculated to produce the same results.

Mr. B. after showing that this right of petition, within the meaning of the Constitution, had no relation to Abolition petitions; and that no one on that floor had ever attempted to interfere with its exercise, observed that there was something abhorrent in the whole proceedings in relation to this subject. If, said he, these gentlemen were not Abolitionists, they were drumming up recruits for them—if they did not mean to fight their battles, they were enlisting soldiers for them. If you look at the right of petition, said he, as guarantied in the Constitution, it refers exclusively to a redress of grievances, and what grievances had these Abolitionists to redress? Was slavery in the Southern States a grievance of theirs? But it was said their tender consciences were aggrieved, and they felt themselves, under a solemn sense of religious duty, bound to interfere. If it was a religious obligation, as well might their tender consciences be aggrieved because in the State he came from the sect of Methodists was more numerous than that of the Presbyterians. These gentlemen talked much about liberty and universal emancipation. He would ask them if they had ever yet considered what was the species of liberty enjoyed by this country. Was it not a constitutional liberty? There was no other liberty, he said, in the country. But these gentlemen said that those who represented the States most interested, were unnecessarily alarmed; that they suffered themselves to be too much excited on the subject. Why not, say they, let these petitions be referred and reported on; why not come up cooly and discuss this question? This was the language held out by Northern gentlemen of a certain party in that House. These gentlemen could, no doubt, speak such language with great freedom. What had they at stake in this momentous question? Were their wives, or their children, or their firesides in danger? Had they at stake every thing that was dear to man? And yet they would tell Southern gentlemen, who had not only all these, but their personal security at stake, "You ought not to feel excitement on this subject; we will take care of you." But, said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, we do not mean to do you any injury. You gentlemen of the South do not understand your own interests as well as we do. Just let us take them and manage them for you. You are an ignorant set of men, and do not know what is for your own good. We do not intend to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, at least until we are prepared to do so; but all we want is for you to receive our petitions, and acknowledge that we have the right to regulate your affairs. This was not the exact language of the gentleman, it was true, but it was very much like what it amounted to. While endeavoring to coax up Southern men in this way, they put forth language which was sufficient to rouse every slave in the nation to murder and assassination. Gentlemen professed the utmost horror of being suspected of any such designs; but when they put the argument in the mouth of the ignorant slave, to justify murder and assassination, who was most to blame, the assassin or the instigator? Mr. B. after continuing for some time, gave way to

Mr. TURNEY, who moved an adjournment.

Mr. BLACK asked the courtesy of the gentleman to allow him to offer a resolution to authorise the Clerk to employ a printer. The public business (Mr. B. said) was suffering for the want of printing that ought to be done; and in offering this resolution, he would observe that it was precisely the same as that introduced by his colleague, [Mr DAWSON.]

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS and others objected.

Mr. BLACK said he had the permission of the gentleman, who was entitled to the floor, to offer this resolution, and he would submit it to the CHAIR whether it was in order for him to do so. As certain of the delegation from Georgia had been denounced in advance, in a paper in that State, for a supposed intention to vote for Blair and Rives as Printers, he had endeavored to bring himself up to the position occupied by his friend and colleague, [Mr. DAWSON,] who, as he was a very cautious man, and always in the line of safe precedents, must in this instance at least be supposed to be good authority. The resolution, Mr. B said, was precisely in the words of that offered in the early part of the session by his colleague.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked to be permitted to offer a resolution to continue in existence for ten days longer the rules of the House—the time for which they had been adopted, having expired to-day.

Mr. BLACK said, if any resolution was in order, his must have priority, and as it was necessary for the despatch of the public business, he hoped the House would receive it.

Mr. B's resolution was then read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed and authorised to employ some suitable person or persons to execute the necessary printing of this House, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of 1819, until the further order of this House.

Mr. TURNEY then renewed his motion for adjournment, Mr. BYNUM retaining the floor for to-morrow, when

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky called for the yeas and nays, which, having been ordered, the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 98, nays 52; so

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, January 24, 1840.

The Hon. DANIEL STURGEON, elected by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania a Senator from that State, for six years, from the 4th of March, 1839, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Commissioner of Patents, showing the operations of his office during the year 1839; which was referred to the Committe on Patents and the Patent Office, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a number of citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, asking Congress to impose a moderate duty upon the importation of silk.

In presenting this memorial, Mr. B. said that he would take the liberty of making a few brief remarks. The morus multicaulis speculation had passed away; but, unlike other speculations, it had produced consequences which were destined, at no distant day, to promote essentially the prosperity of the country. The culture and manufacture of silk were now naturalized amongst us, and must, ere long, in a considerable degree, serve to reduce the amount of those extravagant importations which were so injurious to the best interests of the country. In the year 1836, silks had been imported to the value of nearly $23,000,000, and in 1837 the amount was more than $14,000,000. In the general reduction of imports in 1838, their value had sunk to $10,000,000; but the expansion of 1839 had doubtless considerably increased the amount, although he had no information in his possession which enabled him to state precisely to what degree. It was an astonishing fact, that during the three years of 1836, 1837, and 1838, we had imported considerably more than three times a greater amount in value of silks than we had exported in flour.

Mr. B. said he had not the least doubt, that before the close of the present session, we should be compelled to raise additional revenue to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government. And, he asked, was there a single article imported into the country, upon which a duty could be imposed with greater propriety than upon silks? Silk goods were articles not of necessity, but of luxury; and by far the larger proportion of the tax would be paid by the wealthy. Whilst it would be imposed for the purpose of revenue alone, it would afford incidental encouragement to the domestic production of this article; and there was no anti-tariff Senator within his knowledge, who would object to such a consequential benefit to so important a domestic interest. A duty upon the importation of silks would not violate, but was in accordance both with the letter and spirit of the compromise act of March, 1833. This act expressly provided, that in the contingency of a deficiency of revenue, duties might be imposed, not exceeding twenty per cent. upon such articles as either paid no duty, or a less amount of duty than twenty per cent. It was known to the Senate that, under our existing laws, silks were admitted free of duty. In his opinion, it would be much wiser to raise a revenue upon the importation of silks, than to create a debt against the country, either by the issue of Treasury notes, or by borrowing money.

Mr. B. said that we had no treaty with any foreign nation which would prevent Congress from imposing any duty they might think proper on the importion of silks. He had heard it stated in conversation, that our treaty with France might stand in the way; but he had examined this treaty, and found it had no application whatever to the subject.

He knew that, under the Constitution of the United States, all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate might propose such amendments to these bills as they thought proper. Notwithstanding this prohibition, he hoped that the Committee on Finance of the Senate might have an opportunity of constitutionally expressing their opinion on this subject before the close of the session; and to their hands he committed it with the most perfect confidence.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. LINN, it was ordered that John Perry have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, it was ordered that the petition of Richard Elliott, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying appropriation for harbors and a light-house on Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from citizens of Illinois, in relation to the lands granted to the Polish exiles; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of George Whitman, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. from the same committee, to which the subjects were referred, reported

A bill for the relief of David Stone; and

A bill for the relief of John J. Mackintosh; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the petitions of Edward Fanning and of Isaac Colyer, made adverse reports thereon.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred a bill to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, to which was referred the memorial of the General Assembly of Alabama, praying the creation of a new land district in that State, asked that it might be printed, to accompany Senate bill No. 13, already reported on that subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred a bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims, &c." reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred a bill for the relief of Richard Robertson, reported it without amendment, and recommended its indefinite postponement.

The bill for the relief of Samuel R. Slaymaker;

The bill to confirm the title to a certain tract of land in the county of Mobile; were severally considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners, to hear and examine claims against the United States, was taken up, and, after having been debated by Messrs. HUBBARD, CALHOUN, TAPPAN, SMITH, of Connecticut, MERRICK, GRUNDY, SEVIER PRENTISS, STRANGE, DAVIS, and HENDERSON, was postponed, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; after which it

Adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, January 24, 1840.

The question before the House was the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina to amend the rules, by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon.

And the proposition of Mr. ADAMS, as a substitute for the above, in the following words:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the Speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, shall the petition be rejected? and no petition shall be rejected but by a majority of the members present."

Mr. BYNUM was entitled to the floor on the above question.

Mr. HOFFMAN rose for the purpose of making a motion that the rules, as amended, be adopted until otherwise ordered.

The CHAIR said the motion would not be in order until the gentleman from North Carolina gave way for that purpose.

Mr. BYNUM said he would not, certainly, refuse permission to any gentleman to submit a motion which would operate for the convenience of the House, if it be the general understanding that he should take the floor afterwards.

Mr. HOFFMAN then submitted his motion to adopt the amended rules until otherwise ordered.

Mr. HAND offered an amendment, proposing the adoption of the rules, with the exception of those authorizing the previous question.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he had not yielded the floor, and moved the previous question on his proposition.

Mr. HAND. We have no rules, and therefore no previous question can be moved. My object is to cut off that question, which so often embarrasses the business of the House.

The CHAIR said the previous question was known to the parliamentary law; and After some further conversation, the motion for the previous question was entertained and seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question on the adoption of the rules, as amended, was then put, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. BOTTS said, by the courtesy of the gentleman from North Carolina, he rose to make a brief explanation, without comment, in regard to a newspaper report.

Cries of "No! No!"

Mr. B. was permitted to proceed. He said it was a custom in that House, one which he should not then undertake to discuss the propriety of, for gentlemen to notice the numerous statements which appear in the various public prints, which misrepresent them; and he would now call the attention of the Speaker and the House to a letter which was placed in his hand, and which appeared to have been written by the letter-writer of the Charleston Mercury. He did not know who this letter-writer was, but he would read the letter, which was as follows:

"In the House, Mr. BOTTS attempted to get up another pistol affair, in consequence of remarks made yesterday by Mr. SMITH of Maine. Mr. B. in his speech of Thursday, was very liberal of his abuse on Andrew Jackson—called him a tyrant, impostor, and of course every thing else vile and villainous. Mr. SMITH, in his reply ye terday, stated that history would give the lie to the opprobrium which had been heaped upon the Hero of New Orleans, and that his memory would live when his abusers and their abuse should be forgotten, &c. To the remark about history, Mr. BOTTS took exception, and expressed a great deal of uneasiness to know whether it was used in a personal sense, and intimated that if it was so intended, daggers, pistols, and bowie knives would be the consequence. To this threat Mr. SMITH, (who, by the way, is a jolly good humored wag, and the the largest man in the House, save Mr. LEWIS,) replied that he meant as usual all that he said, and that if the gentleman lacked a quantum sufficit of that scarce commodity, common sense, to understand words, he really could not at this time waste the money of the people, by giving the chivalrous member from Virginia an opportunity of exterminating him, or vice versa. With this explanation, Mr. BOTTS seemed satisfied, and said a few words about 'whatsoever' insult was intended, not being applicable to him, &c. and took his seat, much mortified at the laughter at which the conclusion of this tragic farce was received by the audience."

Mr. B. said he had no motion to submit on the subject; but he submitted to the Chair, and to every gentleman on that floor, if they did not recognise this letter as a base fabrication from beginning to end; and he submitted it to the House, if it did not become their dignity, if privileged seats be given by them, that they should, at least, not be given to blackguard letter-writers, to misrepresent what takes place there. He understood that they were admitted as reporters of facts and proceedings, and not as letter-writers, to misrepresent what actually occurs.

Mr. PETRIKIN gave notice that he would ask leave, on Tuesday next, or the first day that it would be in order to do so, to report a bill to repeal an act to relieve from duty, iron prepared for, and actually laid on, railways or inclined planes, approved 14th July, 1832, and to graduate the duty to be paid on such iron hereafter imported from foreign countries.

Mr. KEIM rose for the purpose of offering a petition of high privilege, as it goes to the very organization of the House. It is a petition from CHARLES J. INGERSOLL, claiming a seat upon this floor as the Representative of the people of the Third Congressional district of Pennsylvania. He trusted that the importance of this subject would be acknowledged, and hoped he might be permitted to send it to the Clerk's desk, and have it read.

Objection was made by Mr. R. GARLAND.

Mr. RAMSAY said the gentleman the other day had objected to the reception of the petition which he presented from the citizens of the Third Congressional district on this subject, on the ground that they had nothing to do with the question; and at the same time said if it were a petition from Mr. INGERSOLL, he would not have objected. Mr. R. said this petition was from that gentleman himself; whereupon,

Mr. R. GARLAND withdrew his objection, and

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, was, without being read, referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, said, before proceeding to the regular business, he would move that the Committee of Elections be permitted to sit during the sittings of the House; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. W. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by permission, reported from said committee a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1840; which was twice read, and, on his motion, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BELL presented sundry depositions in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which were, on his motion, referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. RAMSAY made another effort to present the petition from the citizens of the Third Congressional district of Pennsylvania, in relation to the contested seat of Mr. NAILOR; but was objected to.

Mr. SARGEANT made an effort to report a bill from the Judiciary Committee, proposing to correct certain errors in the census law of last year; but it was also objected to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Kentucky, asked permission to make a report from the Committee on Territories, in relation to the difficulties existing between the State of Missouri and the Territory of Iowa. The difficulties had been temporarily settled there, but it was believed they would come to hostilities yet, in consequence of the Governor of Missouri having refused to abide by the agreement entered into by the citizens of the two counties disputing. He thought that report would allay all excitement.

Mr. HUBBARD said he objected to its reception, because there was a war going on in that House between the Abolitionists and the people of the South, and until that was settled, he would not consent to any motion of the kind.

Mr. BYNUM proceeded in his remarks. He referred to the extraordinary remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] a few days ago, and those of Mr. HUNT on yesterday, disclaiming that they were Abolitionists; and endeavoring to rid themselves and the Whig party of the odium of being identified with the Abolition party. The latter gentleman, particularly, had asserted that some of the leading men of the Democratic party were also identified with the cause of Abolition. That gentleman had alluded to the case of Gerrit Smith, of New York, who (he said) was nominated by some of the Democratic party at Albany for the United States Senate. Mr. B. was proceeding to make an explanation to show that this nomination was not a nomination by the Democratic party, but was an individual movement, more in burlesque than in seriousness, when

Mr. FILLMORE said he did not understand his colleague [Mr. HUNT] as saying that Mr. Smith had been put in nomination by the Democratic party. He understood him as saying that he had been put in nomination by a member from the county of Otsego, (who had been run as Speaker by that party,) and that that gentlemen had moved that the name of Gerrit Smith be inserted in the bill as a proper person to be supported for United States Senator.

Mr. PRENTISS, by the permission of Mr. B. made the following explanation of the case referred to above. Mr. P. said Mr. HUNT, of New York, in his remarks of yesterday, referred to the fact that Mr. Levi S. Chatfield, who represents the county of Otsego, in the Assembly of that State, had moved to insert the name of Gerrit Smith, a leading Abolitionist, in a bill appointing a United States Senator, and spoke of it as an evidence that the Democrats of the North favored that interest, Mr. Chatfield being, he said, a prominent member of that party, and its candidate for Speaker of the body of which he is a member.

Mr. P. asked leave to say a word in reply to the imputation upon Mr. Chatfield of being an Abolitionist. He said that Mr. C. was one of his constituents, and that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNT] had spoken truly when he pronounced him to be a man of talents and influence. Mr. P. knew him well, and could assure the House that he was a Democrat; and one, too, who had been a uniform opponent of Abolitionism, not only in the county of Otsego, but in the Legislative Hall of his State, where the Democrats had sent him for the last two years to look after their interests. In the preliminiary action of the Assembly on the question of appointing a Senator, Mr. Chatfield having been called on to nominate a candidate, named Eben. B. Morehouse, who is a resident of the same town where my home is, and who has, on every suitable occasion, repudiated abolition doctrines and sentiments; but in the further progress of the question, a bill was introduced for consummating the appointment, and Mr. C. finding that the Whigs were determined that no other name but that of Nathaniel P. Tallmadge should be inserted in it, and after the names of Albert H. Troy and Addison Gardner, two distinguished gentlemen of opposite politics had been rejected, moved that of Gerrit Smith, as a sort of burlesque upon the whole proceeding, which was carried on in such "hot haste" as to break over all the rules of legislation, the majority even refusing to print the bill which solemnized the marriage banns between Whigery and Conservatism.

Mr. BYNUM then examined the arguments in support of the right of petition by the gentlemen who had preceded him, to which he dissented. He then went over the whole field of constitutional rights involved in this question, and presented many new views; and then adverted to that portion of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] in which he had spoken of the tremendous influence the English literature was exerting over the question of slavery throughout the civilized world; and adverted to the remarks of Mr. HUNT, as to the denunciations which were being heaped upon America by foreign periodicals for permitting the institution of slavery to exist. He denounced, in the warmest terms, the course of argument thus pursued, and the reference to the opinions of British serfs, by those gentlemen, for the purpose of operating on our own liberal institutions.

Mr. B. then referred to the report of Mr. Pinckney in 1836, and the effort made by the Whig party and Abolitionists to stifle that report. By reference to the yeas and nays, he proved that they identified themselves with the Abolitionists, and voted with them against the resolutions accompanying that report. These resolutions declared that Congress possessed no constitutional authority to interfere with slavery in the States or District of Columbia, and proposed to receive and lay all petitions on that subject on the table, without being read or debated. These resolutions had even been denounced in the South as Northern resolutions, because they admitted the reception of Abolition petitions, while they were universally denounced by the Abolition presses of the North as interfering with the sacred right of petition.

The powerful arguments of that report, he said, had not produced the effect to allay the excitement; it had not given quiet to the Abolitionists, but, on the contrary, had only increased their strength. Mr. B. then alluded to the report of Mr. CALHOUN on incendiary publications; and the bill which had accompanied that repert for their suppression, which he said passed that body by the casting vote of Mr. VAN BUREN, then Vice President. No one, he said, could doubt the talent of Mr. CALHOUN, the author of that report. Yet the powerful arguments contained in it did not satisfy the Abolitionists. They of the North want argument, said the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] They want to reason, to talk with us, &c. Mr. B. would inquire of them if the speech of Mr. CLAY, in the Senate of the United States, was not one fraught with the most powerful arguments against the prayers of the Abolitionists? That speech, powerful as it was, did not satisfy or quiet them; but, on the contrary, only excited them to renewed exertions. He believed the very able arguments of that speech sealed the fate of Mr. CLAY with the Abolitionists, and deprived him of the nomination for which he had been so long aspiring.

Mr. B. then read from the Emancipator the exultation of the Abolitionists at the nomination of Gen. Harrison for the Presidency and at the defeat of Mr. Clay, in justification of the above opinion.

Mr. B. believed when gentlemen from the North asserted on that floor that all the Abolitionists wanted to satisfy them was argument, that they knew it was without foundation. They do not want argument—they want their prayers granted—they know the feelings of that House towards them; yet they flood us with their petitions, and it is all stuff to attempt to satisfy them. If the House should determine to receive and discuss these petitions every year, it would be impossible eventually to do any of the public business of the country.

Mr. B. then examined into the history of the proceedings of the House at previous sessions, on propositions connected with this subject, for the purpose of proving that all those who aided and abetted the Abolitionists on that floor, with very few exceptions, were Whigs. He went into a history of the proceedings of this year to the same end, proving that all the speeches made, in any manner aiding the cause of the Abolitionists, were by Northern Whigs. He then adverted to the yeas and nays in further proof. Those on the decision of the Speaker that the presentation of petitions, according to parliamentary law, comprehended the motion of reception. A Whig [Mr. BARNARD, of New York] took an appeal from that decision. He believed the whole South and Democratic party voted to sustain the appeal; and fifty voted against it, of which forty-eight were Whigs and Abolitionists. The gentlemen, he said, were attempting to clear their skirts of the shame of supporting the Abolitionists; but, from their votes on this proposition, they might tell him till doomsday they were not Abolitionists, he would not believe them, because their votes show that they have indirectly aided their cause.

On the motion to lay the question of reception of the Abolition petition presented by Mr. LINCOLN on the table, 68 Whigs and Abolitionists voted against it, and only 6 Democrats. The Whigs came up to the rescue of the Abolitionists like men, yet this, they say, means nothing.

The resolution of Mr. COLES, of Virginia, proposing to receive those petitions, and lay them on the table without debate or further action, was before the House, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] moved to lay it on the table. 102 voted for that motion, and 98 against it. There were only 8 Democrats who were in favor of laying it on the table.

The resolution of Mr. COLES was identical with that offered by Mr. Patton a few years ago, and which was the effect of a meeting of the Southern gentlemen, and which met their entire approbation.

These facts were, he knew, unpleasant to gentlemen; but they must remember that they made certain charges, and they ought at the time to have known that these facts would appear in judgment against them. Yes; there was not a single Northern Whig who voted against laying Mr. COLES's resolution on the table, while every Northern Democrat voted for it. I know that some of my Southern brethren have strong prejudices, and are unwilling to vote in favor of any resolution coming from the Democratic party. They may believe the measure is right of itself, but oppose it, in consequence of the party it comes from.

Mr. BYNUM having given way at the request of Mr. HABERSHAM of Georgia,

Mr. HABERSHAM said that he and his colleagues had all voted against the adoption of Mr. COLES's resolution. That it would appear from the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, that they may have been actuated, in giving that vote, by the consideration that the resolution had come from one of the Democratic party. Mr. H. said that he and his colleagues were actuated by no such motive—that they had voted without reference to such considerations—that even if they had been inclined to vote for it, which they were not, and had voted for it, that not one of them, in his opinion, could have hoped to come back here, because they and their constituents were opposed to the reception of these petitions altogether. Whereas COLES's resolution proposed to receive them and lay them on the table without further action.

Mr. B. said the gentleman from Georgia had misunderstood him if he supposed he had attributed any improper motive to him. There were no gentlemen, of either party, for whom he had more respect than the gentlemen from the State of Georgia. He then referred to other votes much stronger than the above, and particularly to the resolution of Southern gentlemen, where all the Northern Whigs voted with the Abolitionists against the propositions from the South, while the Democrats sustained them, which, he said, was sufficient to open the eyes of the Southern Whigs to the position they occupied with that party.

Mr. B. then referred the Southern men to the source from whence those Abolition petitions came; nine-tenths of which, by reference to the Clerk's files, had been presented to that House by Whigs of the North.

Mr. B. said, if there was any doubts in the minds of the Southern people as to who were and who were not Abolitionists in that House, they need only refer to the speeches and the votes of its members. If they wanted further evidence, I would refer them to the remarks of a certain member of this House who characterised the Northern Democrats, who usually vote for preserving the constitutional obligations imposed on them, and who are opposed to an interference with the rights of the South, as "Southern slaves." He would refer them to the remark made by a certain Abolitionist of the House, [Mr. PECK,] when the vote was about being taken on laying Mr. COLES's resolution on the table, "now come up you Southern slaves, and show yourselves." Yes, sir, this was the language applied to these patriotic, high-minded men, who regard their constitutional obligations to the South, who are for giving quiet to the North on this exciting subject, and for preventing a servile and desolating war.

Mr. PECK here interrupted Mr. B and desired to know if the gentleman alluded to him.

Mr. BYNUM. I allude to a gentleman of the name of PECK.

Mr. PECK. I can only say that if the gentleman alludes to me, and speaks of my language as coming from an Abolitionist, he says what is not true.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman is not an Abolitionist, there is not one in existence; all his votes and all his speeches on that question are given in support of the Abolition party. I believe he is one, and will venture to say that there are not ten members of the House who are not of the same opinion.

Mr. PECK again interrupted Mr. B., and said it was not true that he was an Abolitionist.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman mean to say that I knowingly assert what is false?

Mr. PECK. I mean to say that the gentleman asserts what is not true.

Mr. BYNUM. Then I say that the gentleman is a blackguard and a scoundrel. Mr. SPEAKER, it is now seen what course certain gentlemen take when their conduct is exposed—when their votes are brought to light in opposition to their assertions they resort to bullying and browbeating for an answer. The House will bear me witness that I never willingly insult any one.

Mr. PECK. For the reason that he is incapable of doing so.

Mr. BYNUM here, amid loud cries of "order, order," and, while great confusion and disorder was prevailing, made some remarks, which were not distinctly heard by the Reporter. He was understood, however, as calling upon the SPEAKER to order "that blackguard and scoundrel" to take his seat and not to interrupt him further.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, with great reluctance, rose to a question of order. He could not remain silent in a body, whenever conduct like this was permitted; and he trusted that it would be the sentiment of the House, that no excitement, however great, justified language such as they had just heard. I move, said he, that, before the gentleman from North Carolina is allowed to proceed, the House take some order on the subject.

Mr. JAMESON move that the House do adjourn.

Mr. PECK called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered; and the question was taken, resulting in—yeas 32, nays 141.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, then rose and said: I waited for some time after the objectionable language had been used by the member from North Carolina, in hopes that the general disapprobation heard from all sides of the House would have induced him to withdraw it.

Mr. BYNUM said, if the gentleman would give way one moment, he would make an explanation, which he thought would be satisfactory to him and to the House. I admit, said Mr. B. that my language was harsh; that it was unparliamentary and unsuited to this body; but I was driven to it by the outrageous and wanton insult that was offered me. I therefore most respectfully apologise to the House, and hope this explanation will be satisfactory to it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, hoped this would satisfy the gentleman from South Carolina. The gentleman from North Carolina had made every explanation that the House ought to require, and he hoped he might be permitted to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, after some remarks, submitted to the House that the apology of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] was not sufficient. He trusted the House would consider it necessary for the gentleman to withdraw the language he applied to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BYNUM. "Never, never!" Several voices at the same time were heard saying "never, never."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, said the gentleman from North Carolina had admitted that he used language that was too strong, and had apologised to the House for it. This was all he thought the House ought to ask. He thought the gentleman from North Carolina had done what was due to himself, and his position as a member on that floor, and he hoped he might be permitted to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. PETRIKIN rose, and amid loud cries of, "order, order," said he rose to a question of order. There was a certain set of men in that Hall who think they can do as they please, and are in the habit of jumping up and interrupting gentlemen addressing the Chair, whenever any thing is said that is unpalatable to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland calling Mr. P. to order,

The SPEAKER desired him to make his point of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN. I will sir. The gentleman from North Carolina having apologised to the House for his remarks, I move that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PECK] be required by the House to withdraw the insulting language which called it forth. Sir, said Mr. P. we have had nothing but disorder here from the beginning of the session. Have we not heard to-day two gentlemen from New York continually interrupting the member from North Carolina, who had the floor; and did not one of them get up, while he was speaking, and make the most insulting observations to him?

Mr. JOHNSON here interrupted Mr. PETRIKIN, and, with several others, called him to order.

Mr. PETRIKIN. Is this to be tolerated, Mr. SPEAKER? Is such bear-garden conduct to be allowed in this Hall?

Loud cries of "order, order," during which

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said the resolution he offered was that the gentleman should withdraw his language.

Mr. PETRIKIN. I want that resolution read.

The SPEAKER said, that no resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina had been received by the CHAIR.

Mr. PETRIKIN then renewed his motion.

Mr. THOMPSON said his motion had precedence, and asked that the question be put on it.

The SPEAKER was of the opinion that the resolution of the gentleman of from South Carolina was not offered.

Mr. PETRIKIN's resolution having been reduced by him to writing, was here read by the CLERK.

Mr. BRIGGS said the rules required the gentleman from Pennsylvania to put the words used by the gentleman from New York, and to which he objected, into writing.

Mr. PETRIKIN declined doing so, when

The SPEAKER said the resolution, then, was out of order.

Mr. PECK hoped the House would indulge him in saying one word. He had risen, not for the purdose of saying any thing in relation to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] further than to express his desire that, if any member believed he had used language disrespectful to the House, or indecorous or unparliamentary, he would send to the Chair a resolution to that effect. If the House should determine that the language he used was offensive, he would leave his place here, he would leave the world, before he would retract it. He was charged with being an Abolitionist. He denied the charge; and before he would retract that denial, he would cease to live.

Mr. DUNCAN then moved that the gentleman from North Carolina be permitted to proceed; which motion was agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. HAND,

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 25, 1840.

To the Editor of the Globe:

SIR: Your Reporter misapprehended my object yesterday. It was, as the resolution I offered will show, not to dispense with the "previous question," but, on the contrary, to restore it to its old position during last Congress, and rid it of the crippling effect of the amendment recently adopted by this House. I wished to restore to it its power to cut the Gordian knot of artful and dilatory amendments, by which I feared important bills might be greatly retarded, if not defeated.

A. C. HAND.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, December 26, 1839.

Mr. PETRIKIN (with the permission of Mr. BYNUM, who was entitled to the floor) rose and moved a correction of the journal with regard to the time at which he had given notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill relative to the repeal of the duties on railroad iron; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. PECK rose and asked permission to make a correction with regard to the report of yesterday's proceedings in one of the city papers.

The SPEAKER asked if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] gave way.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly, for an explanation.

Mr. PECK observed that he wished to correct, by a verbal statement, an erroneous report of some part of yesterday's proceedings in one of the papers of this city, at which he felt somewhat aggrieved. In the Globe of yesterday he saw the following report in continuation of the sketch given of the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM:]

"Mr. B. said, if there was any doubts in the minds of the Southern people as to who were and who were not Abolitionists in that House, they need only refer to the speeches and the votes of its members. If they wanted further evidence, I would refer them to the remarks of a certain member of this House who characterised the Northern Democrats, who usually vote for preserving the constitutional obligations imposed on them, and who are opposed to an interference with the rights of the South, as 'Southern slaves.' He would refer them to the remark made by a certain Abolitionist of the House, [Mr. PECK,] when the vote was about being taken on laying Mr. COLES's resolution on the table, 'now come up you Southern slaves, and show yourselves.' Yes, sir, this was the language applied to these patriotic, high-minded men, who regard their constitutional obligations to the South, who are for giving quiet to the North on this exciting subject, and for preventing a servile and desolating war.

"Mr. PECK here interrupted Mr. B. and desired to know if the gentleman alluded to him.

"Mr. BYNUM. I allude to a gentleman of the name of PECK."

Mr. PECK continued. Now, sir, I do not read the remaining portion of the report of what followed, not because it is not grossly and entirely incorrect in more than one instance, but because my only desire is to make a correction of that part of it where I was personally alluded to. If I had not regarded myself as personally alluded to—if no more had been said by the member from North Carolina than appears in that report, I should not have felt myself called on to notice it, because there was no such language used by me as that in the report. It would require a great obliquity of understanding to suppose that I used the term "Southern slaves" in reference to any members of this House, and therefore I could hardly have supposed that I was personally alluded to by the member from North Carolina in that part of his remarks. So much of the paragraph he had quoted down to the words "Southern slaves," was correct. But the report omitted to give the language which called forth his notice. According to his recollection it was substantially this: The member from North Carolina, turning himself towards him, said, "the voice came from that quarter"—"it was from a rank Abolitionist;" and by the gentleman's turning himself round towards him at the time he supposed the remark was intended for him, and noticed it accordingly. Those who knew him, knew that he was not an Abolitionist, and he could not permit any one to apply that epithet to him on this floor without a contradiction. The language attributed to him by the gentleman from North Carolina, and reported in the Globe, was such as he never had used; and he therefore could not have supposed that it was applied to him. But he regarded himself as personally alluded to, when the gentleman turned round towards him and used the language he had quoted.*

Mr. SMITH asked permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, and of the House, to introdnce a resolution which he said was intended to facilitate the transaction of the public business. [Cries of "No, no!" and "let us hear what it is," from others.]

Mr. S. said it was a resolution to appropriate one hour every morning to the reception of petitions, not on the subject of Abolition.

Objections being made by several, the resolution was not received.

Mr. BYNUM, who was entitled to the floor, rose, and said, he regretted exceeding a continuaon of the most unpleasant controversy that occurred yesterday evening—but in justification of the observations he then made, he would read an extract from a report in one of the journals of the day, showing the evidence on which his remarks were predicated. In the report of the proceedings on Mr. COLES's resolution, he found the following:

"Mr. PECK moved for a call of the House. There were some Northern slaves there, he said, whom he wanted to be emancipated. Mr. P. then called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 86, nays 113."

In another part of the same report he found a motion made by the same gentleman, as follows:

"Mr. PECK moved a call of the House, but subsequently withdrew his motion. We have, said he, some refugee slaves from the North that I wish brought in."

This (said B.) was the report of the proceedings on the day Mr. COLES's resolution was acted on; and as it has remained uncontradicted to this day, I am warranted in presuming that it was correct. It was true (he said) he made a mistake in using the term "Southern slaves," instead of "Northern slaves;" but even with that mistake, the gentleman alluded to could not avoid knowing for whom the allusion was intended; nor could any one doubt at the time that the term "Northern slaves" was applied to those members of this House who are for preserving the Constitution, and sustaining the peace and tranquillity of the country, with the perpetuity of our institutions. It was the first time, Mr. B. said, on the floor of Congress, that to call a man an Abolitionist was deemed so offensive, as to call forth a gross and wanton insult in reply.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. B. that no personal allusion would be permitted.

Mr. BYNUM said he made no personal allusions. He never deemed it an offence to call a man an Abolitionist. He never denied that there were some few Democrats in the Abolition ranks. Their votes showed that there were from five to ten of them in this House. But what he wanted the country, and the South particularly, to know, was, that there were from sixty-five to seventy-five deeply died Abolitionists in the Whig ranks in that House.

Mr. B. proceeded to examine the course of the Whigs and Abolitionists in Congress, and in the States, and among other cases, to show that they uniformly acted together, he referred to the vote on the admission of Arkansas into the Union. The whole Democratic party of the North voted for the bill, and of the fifty who voted against it, forty-five were Whigs and Abolitionists. The vote in the Senate, in favor of the bill was thirty-one, and against it six. Every Abolition State there voted in the negative. He then referred to the course of the Whig party in New York, Pennsylvania, and other States, in which he conclusively proved by the facts read to the House, that the Whigs had invariably acted with, and in defence of the Abolitionists.

Mr. B. replied to that portion of the remarks of Mr. STANLY in which he asserted that Mr. Morton, the Democratic candidate for Governor of Massachusetts, was an Abolitionist. He said he held in his hand, and read to the House, an address from Garrison, the great champion of the Abolition party, in which he called on the Abolitionists of that State to vote for Mr. Everett, the Whig candidate, on the ground that that gentleman was in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery; and, at the same time, denounced the Democratic candidate (Morton) for not being one. Mr. B. hoped this call would be received as good evidence of the identity of Whiggery and Abolition there, and would have the effect to open the eyes of the South that the charge that the Democrats were in favor of Abolition, and which was intended to blind and delude some of them, was unfounded. Mr. B. then referred to the effect which the abolition movements would have upon the commerce and manufactures of that State. He asked who gave support to those two great interests? Who consumed those manufactures, and gave employment to the shipping of that State? It was the effect of the labor of the South; the substance of the rich valley of the Mississippi and fertile soil of the South. It was the South that gave employment to thousands of her citizens. He warned them to avoid the effect the progress of the Abolition cause would produce on her interests. But he congratulated the country that the trammels of Federalism and Abolitionism were about being broken in that State, and hoped that practical men would be permitted to participate in her legislation, and bring about a different state of things. He believed the question would resolve itself into a question of peace or war, if these factions were thus permitted to further their designs.

*The Reporter begs leave to make a brief reply to Mr. PECK's notice of his labors in yesterday's paper. The report was intended merely as an outline of the proceedings, and it is believed was a correct one. The Reporter heard no such remark as that attributed to Mr. BYNUM by Mr. PECK, and still thinks that Mr. P. is mistaken. The Reporter was aware that Mr. BYNUM used the phrase "Southern slaves" incorrectly, but did not feel at liberty to make the correction. He supposed that Mr. PECK recognised its application to himself from the fact of his having, on a former occasion, used "Northern slaves" in the same connection. The Reporter is perfectly willing that any gentleman who thinks that he is not reported correctly, may set himself right before the public, and will be happy to assist him to do so; but he will not recognise the right of any member to put language not in his report, in the mouth of another. This is a license which will be accorded to no human being. As to Mr. PECK's assertion that the "report is grossly and entirely incorrect," the Reporter throws himself on the recollection of every gentleman present. Mr. BYNUM authorises him to say that his remarks were given correctly.

Mr. B. then alluded to the course of Whig Representatives from the city and State of New York, in voting with Abolitionists here, and the effect it would have in destroying the commerce of that State. This great interest in that State was supported by the South and Southwest. That noble city, the now seat of power, would be sacrificed by Abolition movements. Already the South had begun to manufacture for herself, and was taking measures to carry on a commerce of her own.

Mr. B. adverted to the reasons why the Abolitionists were throwing their support for Harrison for the Presidency; and read from the Emancipator portions of his opinions, which, he presumed, had satisfied them; which opinion was, that he was willing to appropriate the surplus revenue to the emancipation of the slaves. Mr. B. asked what was the surplus revenue? It came from the great farming and producing classes of the country; the very men who own these slaves. The operation of this scheme would be to entail upon those classes a tax, to create a surplus for the purpose of paying back to them for their slaves; and thus, in fact, paying them nothing at all for their property.

Mr. B. said, another question has been introduced in the debate on this subject, in relation to the politics of two individuals, candidates for the Presidency, and letters had been read there to prove that the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention, was not an Abolitionist, and that that party would not take him up, and support him for that office. He wished to disabuse his constituents on this subject; and, for that purpose, read a statement showing that a large portion of that convention were Abolitionists of the first order. The vice president thereof, from the State of Massachusetts, was an avowed Abolitionist, and the gentleman on his left, from Massachusetts, admitted it. He did not know much of the opinions of General Harrison, but whether he was an Abolitionist or not, he would have to depend on them for his election; and efforts have been made to conciliate that party; and he had no doubt that every one in the country would support him for that office; and he would put it to gentlemen, if he would not, from the necessity of the case, if elected by Abolition votes, have to favor their schemes. And in proof that he would obtain the Abolition support, he then read from the Emancipator the exultation at the nomination of Harrison, and the acknowledgment of the Editor that "all the slave States went for Clay, and that if it had not been for the Abolitionists, he would undoubtedly have received that nomination." He called upon his Kentucky friends in that House, for whom, as far as he was acquainted, he had great respect, if they did not believe that the above acknowledgment was correct to the letter. He begged them to place their hands upon their hearts and ask themselves if they did not believe, had it not been for that movement, the result would have been different. The Abolition organs before the nomination at the Harrisburg convention, predicted that "no slaveholder would ever be President of the United States," and he believed if the Whigs and Abolitionists be permitted to carry out their designs, that prediction would be verified; it would be the inevitable result from the course of things going on. Yes, Mr. Harrison, to quote his own language from the Emancipator, said, "If my vote would effect it, every surplus dollar should be appropriated to that object." He called upon Southern Whigs to ponder well this language. The course of that personage has been more latitudinous than any man in this country. His votes in the United States Senate show him to be the wildest latitudinarian. He was in favor of internal improvements by the General Government on the most unlimitated scale; and upon every question connected with the tariff, he voted for the highest, even so far as applied to the necessaries of life. He is also a Federalist. John Randolph had called him so, and himself and others for him have not dared to deny it. For the benefit of the State Rights supporters of Harrison, if there be any, there is evidence on record that he declared in favor of General Jackson's proclamation, and eulogised it as a most able document, on account of its principles, and that he gave him far more credit for that one act, than any other of his life. This document received the warmest approval of Daniel Webster, the most ultra Federalist, on account of its strong ground against the State Rights principles. What claims has he, then, upon the States, or Representatives of the States who profess those principles?

Mr. B. concluded his remarks by apologizing to the House for the time he had occupied, and the personal feeling evidenced yesterday. When he commenced, it was his intention to refrain from all personalities; and he did not depart from that course till he was impelled, from a sense of duty, to resent a gross and personal insult. His great object had been, from the commencement, to give them facts, and to give the South and the whole country facts; to disabuse their minds of the attempt made there to identify the Democratic party with Abolitionists by Southern Whigs, and on the other hand to show that it was by an amalgamation of the Whigs and Abolitionists that the institutions and interests of the South are threatened and endangered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, obtained the floor, and said it was due to himself, before entering on the discussion of the subject before the House, to make a few remarks in relation to the unpleasant altercation which took place on yesterday. He had understood that the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] before he made the motion for him to proceed in his remarks, had retracted the offensive words applied to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECK.] But he had since learned that the gentleman had not done so. If he had so understood him yesterday, that he did not withdraw that language, he would not have made the motion or remarks he did. He was the last man to palliate unparliamentary language, and he believed it was calculated to do more injury to the individual using it, than to those it was intended to apply.

Mr. J. then proceeded in his remarks. He had always been opposed to the discussion of Abolition before that House, in any shape or form, because he did not consider it a debateable question. It may have been supposed, from his anxiety to obtain the floor, that he wanted to make a speech; but such was not his intention. His anxiety had been to get the floor to call the previous question on the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON.) But subsequently, from the vast range which had been taken, not upon the merits of the question, but, he believed, to make political capital out of it, he now felt himself called upon to depart from that course. He felt himself bound to speak his sentiments, that they might be known to his constituents and the State he in part represented. An effort had been made by various gentlemen who had spoken, to show that the Whig party of the United States are anxious to conciliate favor with the Abolitionists, and since the nomination of Harrison had endeavored to throw odium on his character. This had made it manifestly proper for him to throw himself on the indulgence of the House, that his State, which is more interested in this question than most any other, might know his views. He characterised the resolutions which had been presented on this subject, as too vague to meet his approbation; and therefore wished, before concluding, to offer a resolution in a more tangible form, which would leave no ambiguity; so when a gentleman voted, he could not deceive his constituents, and would clearly define his position. He had voted to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia on the table, because it admitted the reception of these petitions, and was in fact an invitation to the Abolitioniss, to send their petitions there; and which would bring on discussion, without effecting any salutary purpose. The resolutions of Mr. PATTON, of Va. and the one subsequently offered by Mr. ATHERTON did not deny the power of Congress to abolish slavery in this District; consequently, he could not give support to such resolutions. If the right be once conceded to Congress that it had the power, it would lay open the door that would dissolve the whole South in an hour. He had always thought these resolutions a finesse, and therefore opposed them.

In alluding to the period when the whole Southern delegation left this Hall, Mr. J. said he thought he saw on that occasion a manifest attempt to create political capital out of the excitement. He thought he saw an effort to form thereby a nucleus, around which they hoped to gather the whole South for the furtherance and promotion of their selfish views. In this opinion he was firm, and believed as much as if it had been communicated by the voice of inspiration; and it was with that view that he had attended that meeting, to defeat, if possible, such design.

He dwelt at large on the constitutional rights of the South, and contended that every member there had sworn to protect those rights when he took the oath of office, and it became them to act accordingly. He argued the question at some length, and, before concluding, yielded the floor to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who moved that the House adjourn; but, before taking the question,

The SPEAKER, by permission, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, enclosing estimates for the service of that Department; which was, on the motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also certain testimony in relation to the New Jersey contested election; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. LEWIS called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, but they were not ordered; whereupon,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, January 27, 1840.

Mr. SPENCE appeared in his seat this morning.

Mr. WEBSTER, elected by the Legislature of Massachusetts, a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March last, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the credentials of the Hon. N. P. TALLMADGE, elected by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March last; which were read.

Mr. TALLMADGE was then qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

The CHAIR submitted a message from the President of the United States transmitting a report from the Acting Secretary of State, in reply to a resolution of the Senate concerning the slaves in the brigs Comet, Encomium, and Enterprise. [The report states that 23,500 pounds sterling have been appropriated by the British Parliament as a compensation to the owners of the slaves.] Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ult. as to the amount of appropriations necessary to the completion of the Cumberland Road; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a resolution of the Senate respecting the defences of the United States; which was laid on the table.

Also, a report from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the appropriations of 1839; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial from the Legislative Council of the Territory of Iowa, praying an appropriation for a penitentiary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a petition of Mrs. Sally Ross, widow of a Revolutionary soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a petition from Capt. Edward McKabe; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Albany county, praying the establishment of a certain designated post road; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEVIER presented the memorial of James

Harrison, praying the establishment of a port of entry at Van Buren, in the State of Arkansas, for the purpose of facilitating the internal trade with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of a number of citizens of Franklin county, Pennsylvania, praying for a reduction of the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of James Williams; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Esclava; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memoria of citizens connected with the raising of silk; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of Flemming Wood; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr PRENTISS presented the petition of the widow of Samuel Allen, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITE presented the remonstrance of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, against the confirmation of claims to lands preferred by Laventure, Childs, and Thompson; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of agents of certain steam packet companies, plying between the port of New York and various ports of Great Britain, praying such a modification of the laws on drawback as to allow them a debenture on the coal which is consumed by them on their return passage, made a report thereon. The committee were of opinion that a proper construction of the present law would afford the desired relief, and prayed to be discharged from the further consideration thereof. The adoption of the report was advocated by Messrs. WRIGHT and DAVIS, and opposed by Messrs. CLAY, of Kentucky, and KNIGHT, on whose motion it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of the vestry and churchwardens of St. Philips, at Charleston, S. C. praying that they may be allowed to import an organ free of duty, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the fiscal regulations of foreign countries, asked that they be discharged from its further consideration—that it be laid on the table, and printed, and that ten thousand additional copies be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Lewis Gordon, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether the law respecting vessels propelled by steam does not require revision and amendment.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and adjudge claims against the United States was taken up, and after being debated by Messrs. LINN, PRENTISS, SEVIER, HUBBARD, and PRESTON, was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Jan. 27, 1840.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON's proposition to amend the rules, and Mr. ADAMS's amendment thereto, being the order of the day,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, who was entitled to the floor, yielded it to

Mr. J. W. JONES, who reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840; which was read twice, and, on his motion, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. W. JONES, by direction of the same committee, reported some estimates to accompany the bill for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners; which document was ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. W. JONES asked leave of the House to submit a resolution to have the necessary printing executed. He did not wish to extend it beyond the bills and estimates reported from the Ways and Means committee, and only made the motion from a solemn conviction of the absolute necessity of the case. The appropriation bills are all reported, and not one yet printed.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected.

Mr. JONES said one of the bills provided for the payment of the Revolutionary soldiers, and unless it be printed immediately, it will be impossible to pass it before the 4th of March, at which time the payments are due to the pensioners. And if it be not passed by that time, the Secretary of the Treasury will have no funds to pay the old Revolutionary soldier at the various points at which payment is to be made. Two months of the session had been already wasted, and the appropriation bills remain untouched. It is important to do something to secure the passage of the bills, to enable the Government promptly to meet its obligations.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he would persist in his objection, unless the gentleman consented to amend his proposition to have the printing done on the best terms. He had been informed by a gentleman in the city, that it could be done twenty-five per cent. cheaper than the prices paid by Congress.

Mr. JONES then moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer the resolution; which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to employ some suitable person or persons to execute the printing of the bills, which have been reported, together with the accompanying estimates and documents, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of 1819.

Mr. R. GARLAND said he would waive his objection for the present; whereupon,

Mr. J. W. JONES withdrew his motion for the suspension of the rules; there being no further objection,

Mr. GIDDINGS moved the following as a substitute, which was read:

Resolved, That until the further order of the House, the Clerk be directed to procure the printing of the House to be done by such person as will do it with the least possible expense to the Government.

Mr. GIDDINGS called the previous question on his amendment; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays on the main question, being on the adoption of the substitute; which were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana rose to a question of order; whether the previous question would not cut off the substitute, and was proceeding to debate it, but he was ruled out of order by

The SPEAKER, who stated that, under the new rules, it would not, the previous question operating only to bring the House to a vote on the last proposition submitted.

The call for the yeas and nays having been partly completed,

Mr. BOTTS asked leave of the House to permit him and others on the Committee of Elections to record their votes. They were absent, attending to their duties on said committee when their names were called.

Mr. BRIGGS said it had been unusual to permit those belonging to committees that had leave to hold sessions during the sittings of the House, to vote at any time. He had done so himself, under similar circumstances.

Mr. CLIFFORD demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN rose to a point of order. He said, under the 34th rule of the House, no member could vote on a question in which he was personally interested.

The CHAIR said this was a matter of public interest, and the member could not be considered personally interested.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and were—yeas 88, nays 101.

So the gentlemen were not permitted to vote.

The call for the yeas and nays on the substitute of Mr. GIDDINGS was then completed—yeas 109, nays 65.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. DUNCAN, who voted for said amendment, moved to reconsider the vote on the same; and also moved a call of the House before taking the question.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that the call was not in order—on the motion for reconsideration, the same having been taken under the operation of the previous question. He considered it one of the incidental questions necessarily connected with the proposition on which the previous question operated.

Mr. CLIFFORD appealed from that decision, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 95, nays 100.

So the decision of the SPEAKER was not sustained.

Mr. DUNCAN moved a call of the House; and, upon that motion, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 141, nays 44.

The call of the House was then proceeded in until 216 had answered to their names.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, moved that all further proceedings in the call be suspended.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered. Thereupon,

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew his motion.

The call was then proceeded in until the absentees were called over, several of whom were excused on account of indisposition.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, moved to suspend all further proceedings in the call.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

The question then came up on Mr. DUNCAN's motion to reconsider, when

Mr. DUNCAN observed that the amendment virtually destroyed the principle of the resolution of 1819, which was yet in force, and that it was moreover calculated to defeat the very object it contemplated. He would however have no objection to adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Vermont with that amendment they were about to reconsider, (for he was favorable to the principles contained in it, and it was with that feeling that he gave it his vote,) but the object being temporary, for it limited until they could elect a printer, it could not be carried into effect without great inconvenience as well as conflicting with the existing law. He did not know, in the first place, what would be the extent of the duty it imposed on the Clerk, both as to the time and manner of carrying it into execution. He did not know how much time would be required for the Clerk to get this printing done on the most reasonable terms. Was he to do it to-day or to-morrow? this week or the next? The time it would require to do it in would depend in a great measure on the extent of his efforts to carry out the terms of the resolution. In order to get the printing done on the most reasonable terms, must he confine his efforts to Washington city? The Clerk, Mr. D. thought, would require the time necessary to send to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Cincinnati, and receive proposals from those cities, or he could not carry out the provisions of the amendment. Would it not be necessary, he asked, for him to advertise for proposals in all these cities? If so, the object of the resolution would be defeated; and in voting for the reconsideration, he would do so from the absolute necessity of having the printing done immediately. We have not much, Mr. D. said, to fear of the danger of being over charged for the execution of this work. We have the law of 1819, which fixes the prices those who do the work shall receive, and that law was passed by a Congress as competent to understand the subject, and who had the good of the country as much at heart as this. But suppose, in carrying out the intentions of this resolution, the CLERK confines his efforts to the city of Washington. In that case, what is to prevent a combination from being formed among the printers here to raise the prices higher than those allowed by the law of 1819? The resolution, as amended, did not provide for the manner in which the work should be done. It only provided that the CLERK should get the work done on the cheapest terms, without regard to time and without regard to the quality of the work. This was another reason operating with him for moving the reconsideration. No man, Mr. D. said, should go ahead of him in any measure of economy, where economy was practicable; but he did not conceive it to be so in this case. Another objection to the adoption of the resolution arose from the fact that they must soon go into the election of Printer. The interests of the country demanded it, and their duty demanded that these interests should no longer be neglected. Why, then, should we at this time introduce into this resolution, which can only be a temporary measure, provisions which, so far from performing its objects, are only calculated to defeat them? He was not (Mr. D. said) favorable to previous questions. He had assigned, so very briefly, his reasons for moving the reconsideration, as not to render a reply necessary, and he would, therefore, for the second time in his life, move the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that that motion was not in order; but that the gentleman could move to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table, and that motion would, if it prevailed, carry the whole subject with it.

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 106, nays 111.

So the House refused to lay it on the table.

The question then recurring on the motion to reconsider it was decided in the negative—yeas 108, nays 100.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended; on which

Mr. EVERETT demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 115, nays 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Boyd, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, Connor, J. Cooper, M. A. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Doherry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fisher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hook, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, C. Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mitchell, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pickens, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Ridgway, Reed, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—115.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Craig, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawkins, Holleman, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sweeny, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—97.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, then proceeded in his remarks on the proposition to amend the rules. He made a strong constitutional argument against the movements of the Abolitionists, a synopsis of which there is not room in this day's paper, but the speech will be given hereafter at length. Mr. J. before concluding, yielded the floor to Mr. PETRIKIN, on whose motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, January 28, 1840.

The CHAIR presented a message from the President of the United States, communicating a supplement to the annual report of the Chief Engineer; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the persons employed by that bureau, with their compensation, during the last year; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, that settlers on the sixteenth sections be allowed a pre-emption right to the same, and that other lands be set apart as school lands; and

A memorial from the same body, praying that settlers on the mineral lands may be allowed the right of pre-emption; and

A memorial from the same body, praying that the commissioners of Lee county be authorized to enter a quantity of school lands in the Sac and Fox reservation; which were severally referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the same body, praying that Congress provide for that Territory three six-pounder cannon and other munitions of war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial of Jacob Greaves for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a memorial of the Howard Institution of the city of Washington, praying for assistance; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the memorial of the president and directors of the Bank of the Metropolis, in the city of Washington, praying for a renewal of their charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STURGEON presented the memorial of the administrator of George Simpson, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the petition of Mathew Irvine Keith; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of citizens of the State of Delaware, praying for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for Delaware bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorial of the heirs of Dr. Thomas Cooper, praying the repayment of a fine exacted under the Alien and Sedition laws; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of a number of inhabitants of Westchester county, New York, for a reduction of the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of the executors of Henry Eckford; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the memorial of Samuel E. Smith and others, of Wiscasset, praying for a reduction of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YOUNG presented the memorial of Joseph Smith, jr. Sidney Rigdon, and Elias Higbee, in behalf of "The Latter Day Saints," commonly called Mormons, praying for a redress of grievances, inflicted on them by the people of the State of Missouri.

Mr. Y. moved that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After some remarks from Mr. LINN,

Mr. NORVELL moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. YOUNG called for the reading of the memorial, and it was accordingly read.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BENTON, PRESTON, and CLAY, of Kentucky, the motion to lay on the table was agreed to, with the understanding that it would be called up at an early day.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Susannah R. Pickett; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of William Hawkins; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported

A bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez; and

A bill for the relief of George W. Paschall; which were severally read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of John C. Reynolds, late disbursing agent of the Indian Department; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred

A bill concerning the estates of idiots or lunatics and infants in the District of Columbia; and

A bill giving the assent of Congress to the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and for other purposes;

Reported the same without amendment.

Mr. M. also, from the same committee, reported a bill authorising the granting of letters testamentary, and of administration to aliens in the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported an act for the relief of William Osteen; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MERRICK, to admit the District Attorney and the Reporter of the Supreme Court on the floor of the Senate, was taken up and disagreed to.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the cause of the removal of General Call from the government of the Territory of Florida, and the correspondence connected therewith; and also the correspondence between the Department of War and Governor Call, concerning the war in Florida.

The bill for the relief of certain persons therein named; and

The bill for the relief of Samuel R. Slaymaker, were severally read a third time, and passed.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS.

The bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was taken up as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEVIER offered an amendment excluding private land claims from the jurisdiction of the bill; which was not agreed to—ayes 10, noes 31.

Mr. PRENTISS offered an amendment excluding such cases as were within the jurisdiction of the judicial tribunals and the officers of the General Government; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved a new section, making the action of the board, when adverse to the claimants final, but not so when against the United States, and that nothing in the bill should compel claimants to present their claims before this board; which was disagreed to—ayes 12, noes 31.

After some further unimportant amendments, which, with those preceding, were debated by Messrs. HUBBARD, SEVIER, TAPPAN, WALKER, CLAY, of Alabama, PRENTISS, GRUNDY, and HENDERSON, the bill was ordered to be engrossed—ayes 25, noes 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Sturgeon, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Betts, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Fulton, Henderson, Lumpkin, Merion, Norvell, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, and Tappan—16.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, January 28, 1840.

The first business in order was the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina to amend the rules, by the addition of the following:

Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution, or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon.

And the proposition of Mr. ADAMS, as a substitute for the above, in the following words:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the Speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, shall the petition be rejected? and no petition shall be rejected but by a majority of the members present."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, who spoke a part of the day on Saturday and yesterday, on the above propositions, renewed his remarks. He argued the impropriety and unconstitutionality of the people of the North attempting to deprive the people of the South of their slave property, which was valued at twelve hundred millions of dollars. This was the capital, the most available, in fact, upon which the South done all its business; and he considered that it would be equally constitutional and proper for this section of country to make movements in that Hall and elsewhere, to deprive the North of all her manufacturing and other capital, the great sources of its wealth, as for the North to conspire, for the purpose of depriving the South of her slave property. It would be equally a violation of the Constitution, and justice, and right, in one case as in the other.

Mr. J. argued that it had been a blessing to the colored race to keep them in slavery, and drew a comparison of their condition in Africa and this country. In the former, they were little more intelligent than the ourang outang species; but now they had become a civilized and Christianized people, and would, under the dispensations of Providence, contribute to the spread of Christianity throughout the benighted regions of their native country. He then referred to the efforts of the State which he in part represented, to colonize the African race; and thought the movements of the Abolitionists had a tendency to retard these humane efforts. He then referred to the opinions of the people of his own district, and particulary to the society of Friends, who, he said, were as religious and as humane as the people of any other district, and were opposed to all the movements of the Abolitionists. He commented on the course of some gentlemen from the North, who, whilst they were contending for the constitutional right of petition, blinked their eyes at other provisions of the Constitution, which also secured the rights of the people of the South in this species of property inviolate—and which provisions of the Constitution these petitioners ask them to violate, and thereby violate their oaths. He thought the Representatives of the North had better tell their women petitioners to attend to knitting their own hose and darning their stockings, rather than come there and unsex themselves, be laid on the table, and sent to a committee to be reported on. He considered the question of Abolition was but one degree in the rear of amalgamation. He intimated that the people of Maryland, when the proper time came, would defend their property to the last extremity, and that they would not submit to have it severed from them except by the sword. Mr. J. dwelt at some length upon the relative demerits of the propositions before the House, to all of which he was opposed, because they presented no direct issue upon which to vote; to attain which purpose he would offer, before taking his seat, another proposition, and called upon those opposed to the Abolitionists to vote for it, and kill the hydra, Abolition, in an instant, in such manner that it could not germinate its species again; and referred to a precedent on record in the journals, involving the same principle, that had met the support of Messrs. ADAMS, GRANGER, and others, whose support he expected to have on his proposition.

Mr. J. said, so far as this question had been connected with the subject of the next Presidency, he regretted it. He thought it was too important and vital a question to the interests of the country, to be made, in any degree, a party question. He believed, though he was not formerly in favor of Harrison, that the nomination of the Harrisburg convention would meet the unanimous support of the Whig party, and that they would rally, and rout the Administration candidate, "horse, foot, and dragoons." Mr. Clay, he said, was his first choice, and General Scott his second; but he would now, with pride and pleasure, support General Harrison for the Presidency.

Mr. J. after having eulogized Gen. Harrison at some length, gave some reasons why he thought the South should not oppose him.

Mr. J. on concluding, offered the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting it as a substitute:

"That no petition, memorial, resolution, or other paper praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave trade between the States or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this House, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. VANDERPOEL rose, and several gentlemen rising nearly at the same time and claiming the floor, the CHAIR awarded it to Mr. V. when

Mr. GIDDINGS rose to a point of order. He understood that when a gentleman addressed the CHAIR, he must rise in his place. Now the gentleman from New York did not rise in his place.

The CHAIR said that, according to the usual practice of the House, the gentleman was entitled to the floor, though he rose from a seat that was not his own. This practice had never before been objected to.

Mr. BELL said there was a stronger point of order than that. The question before the House had not been propounded by the Chair when the gentleman arose.

The CHAIR then stated the question before the House to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS]

Mr. VANDERPOEL then immediately rose and claimed the floor.

After some remarks from Mr. W. THOMPSON,

Mr. GIDDINGS took an appeal, but subsequently withdrew it, it having been suggested to him by several of his friends, that it was consistent with the usual practice of the House for a gentleman to rise and address the Chair out of his seat.

Mr. DAVIS, of Kentucky, rose to a point of order. The question he said had not been propounded by the Chair, when the member from New York obtained the floor.

The CHAIR said it was true, that when the gentleman first arose, the question had not been propounded; but that the CHAIR did, after that, state the question to the House, when the member from New York, first rising obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would put it to the consciences of gentlemen, whether it was not high time that this interminable and unprofitable debate should close. We had been here nearly eight weeks, and had, as yet, done nothing but to elect a Speaker, and appropriate between three and five hundred thousand dollars to pay ourselves. [Mr. ADAMS here rose and made a point of order. His point of order was, whether, as Mr. V. had avowed his intention to move the previous question, he could be permitted to make a speech.] Mr. V. said he would relieve the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had only said that he would "probably" move the previous question, but had not positively committed himself upon that point. It was his right to speak, and he should do so, if he felt that the occasion required it. Had he not spoken before—were not his speeches scattered through the pages of the debates of this House—he would, if any gentleman could be, justifiable in protracting the debate; for he had been named, goaded, pointed at; yes, every possible effort had been made to provoke him into this debate, and still he had forborne, from the consideration that what he had thought and said on this subject, and what he would again say, if called upon, was on record, so that all who wished to know could know what were his sentiments upon this agitating question. It was "not his talent to conceal his thoughts," and his bold and early expression of them here and at home, had, at a very early period, brought him into market disfavor with the Abolitionists. He had never wooed them; he had never won them, as many Northern politicians had done. To show the estimation in which they held him, he need only say, that though he had always had Abolitionists in his district, they had never sent to him one of their petitions; had never entrusted him with the presentation of them here. It had fallen to the lot of other gentlemen, his colleagues, who were in greater favor with them, to present their petitions. He well recollected that his "Whig" colleague [Mr GRANGER] who some days since eulogised the Abolitionists, by telling us that so many of them had poured out their blood at Lundy's Lane and Chippewa, had here, some three or four years ago, presented an Abolition petition from his (Mr. V's.) district. He (Mr V.) had always been well understood by them. He had always believed, and always so expressed himself, that all their movements were mischievous, incendiary, insulting to our Southern brethren, and against the letter and spirit of the solemn compact into which we had entered with them. He had here always voted to receive their petitions; but the moment they were presented, he had voted, and would again vote, for the strongest possible measure to reject their prayer, nail them to the table, mingle them with the rubbish of your garret, and in the strongest mode mark our disapprobation of their object. He would not vote for the proposition that the petitions should not be received, because he believed that it would be creating a new issue, if we adopted such a proposition—an issue which would have the effect of re-enforcing the Abolitionists. He had always risen, he trusted he would ever rise, above the miserable attempts that had here been made to connect this great and vital question with the pitiful, ephemeral party conflicts of the day. He had also risen, and would ever rise above the idea of opposing the mad schemes of Northern Abolitionists from the narrow consideration of sustaining "Southern interests and Southern institutions." He had taken this stand against them, for higher and holier purposes. It was to maintain the interests of the Union, to fulfil our part of the compact, which formed this confederacy of States. No, it was not as a Northern man, or as a Southern man, that he had so long, here and at home, struggled to defeat the mad efforts of Northern Abolitionists. It was as an American citizen, determined, at all hazards, to discharge a great and paramount duty. As I once before remarked on this floor, I tell you, my Southern brethren, the great mass of the North will fulfil the compact to the letter and spirit. We recognised your property in slaves when we entered into solemn covenant and union with you. We solemnly agreed that they should form part of the basis of representation on this floor; AND UNTIL WE BECOME WRETCHES, AND WHOLLY INSENSIBLE TO THE OBLIGATIONS OF COVENANT AND DUTY, WE WILL FAITHFULLY FULFIL THE COMPACT. Mr. V. said he would now move the previous question.

Mr. RHETT asked permission to say a few words on the subject; but this was denied him.

Mr. RICE GARLAND then moved a call of the House, which was not carried.

The question was then taken on seconding the previous question, and it was carried.

The preliminary question "Shall the main question be now put?" was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 147, nays 61, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Bond, Botts, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, W. B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—61.

Mr. THOMPSON rose to modify his resolution so as to include the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON; but this proposition was ruled to be out of order.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, and it was carried—yeas 115, nays 105.

The question then coming up on the amendment of Mr. ADAMS as amended,

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS moved a postponement of the question "till the House was constituted;" that is—till the State of New Jersey is represented.

The CHAIR said this motion was not in order.

The question was then taken on the resolution as amended, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Botts, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Chapman, Coles, Colquitt, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crockett, Cross, John Davis, John W. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Wick, Thomas W. Williams, and Henry Williams—108.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, authorizing the Clerk to have the printing of the House executed on the cheapest terms, &c. It was evident to the House, he said, after mature reflection, that it would be impossible for the Clerk to comply with the terms of the resolution, and conform strictly to his duty. He was anxious that it should be more particularly defined in its expressions, because the Clerk is not limited either as to time, place, or extent. His object in moving a reconsideration was to make it more definite. He agreed most cordially with the substance of that resolution—that is, that the printing of the House shall be done at the lowest expense to the Government. He should always go for retrenchment and reform; but he was unwilling to yield to the Clerk the prerogative of the House to make its own contracts. Much as he admired the late manly and candid course taken by that officer he was unwilling to give to him the unlimited discretion, or to impose on him the responsibility contemplated by the resolution. If the House would permit him, he would read a resolution which he proposed to offer if the reconsideration prevailed; and it would then be seen whether those gentlemen who were so anxious for economy, and for separating the printing of the House from the political press, were willing to carry out their professions. Mr. D. then read his amendment as follows:

Resolved, That this House will now proceed to the election of a Public Printer, who shall proceed to execute the printing of this House agreeably to the requirements and compensation of existing laws, until such laws are modified by the legislation of Congress; and in the mean time, a committee of seven members shall be appointed by the Chair, who shall, within twenty-one legislative days from the date of their appointment, report to this House what amendments, if any, are necessary to the more prompt, perfect, and economical execution of the printing of Congress; whether the same should be let out to contract, or whether it would be more expedient to execute the same by a Congressional Printing House, press and type belonging to Congress, and subject to its superintendence.

Mr. DAVIS then moved the previous question on the reconsideration, and the motion being seconded by the House,

Mr. RICE GARLAND called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which being ordered, the roll was called over, and it was found that there were—yeas 110, nays 106.

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Simeon H. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Casey, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Henry, John Hill, of Va. Hoffman, Hook, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Henry A. Wise—106.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. GRAVES asked of the SPEAKER, if he was in possession of a communication from Messrs. Gales and Seaton, on the subject of the public printing.

The SPEAKER replying in the affirmative,

Mr. GRAVES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the whole subject of public printing, together with the communication lately received from Gales and Seaton on that subject, be referred to a select committee, to inquire into the best plan of executing the same, and to report by bill or otherwise; and that the printing which has been, or may hereafter be ordered, be executed in all things, except prices, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of Congress relating to that matter, approved March 3, 1819; and the Clerk of this House, under the supervision and control of the Committee of Accounts, is hereby authorized to make a contract or contracts, with some suitable person or persons, to execute said work, upon the best terms it can be done in the District of Columbia, provided the prices shall not exceed those fixed by the aforesaid joint resolution of 1819.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked if it was in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to move the reference of a paper not in the possession of the House.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order; when

Mr. GRAVES modified his amendment, by striking out all that part relating to the communication of Gales and Seaton.

Mr. JAMESON rose to a point of order. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] he said, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, which reconsideration was ordered by the House. But the gentleman, on making the motion, stated that his object was, if the reconsideration prevailed, to offer an amendment, the purport of which he stated to the House. The vote, therefore, for reconsideration, was given with the understanding that this proposition of the gentleman from Indiana was to be received and acted on, and it was not competent for the CHAIR to entertain another and distinct proposition as had been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER required the gentleman from Missouri to reduce his point of order to writing; but at this stage of the business,

Mr. JAMESON yielded the floor to a motion for adjournment, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 30th ult. in relation to the massacres and devastations committed by the Indians in the Territory of Florida; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The CHAIR also submitted a message from the President of the United States, supplementary to a message received a few days since, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary. The message was read, and was as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the Senate, with reference to their resolutions of the 17th instant, copies of two official notes which have passed, subsequently to the date of my message of the 22d, between the Secretary of State and the British Minister at Washington, containing additional information in answer to the resolutions referred to.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 29th January, 1840.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to acquaint Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State of the United States, that since the date of his last official note of the 12th instant, he has been furnished by her Majesty's authorities in North America with more correct information than he then possessed, respecting certain reported movements of British troops within the disputed territory, which formed the subject of a part of that official note, as well as of the two official notes addressed by the Secretary of State to the undersigned on the 24th of December, and on the 16th of the present month. The same reported movements of troops were referred to in a recent message from the Governor of Maine to the Legislature of the State, and also in a published official letter addressed by the Governor of Maine to the President of the United States, on the 23d of December.

It appears from accurate information now in the possession of the undersigned, that the Governor of Maine, and, through him, the President, and General Government of the United States, have been misinformed as to the facts. In the first place, no reinforcement has been marched to the British post at the Lake Temiscouata, the only change occurring there has been the relief of a detachment of her Majesty's 24th regiment, by a detachment of equal force of the 11th regiment; this force of one company being now stationed at the Temiscouata post, as it always has been, for the necessary purpose of protecting the stores and accommodations provided for the use of her Majesty's troops, who may be required, as heretofore, to march by that route to and from the Provinces of Canada and New Brunswick. In the second place, it is not true that the British authorities either have built, or are building, barracks on both sides of the St. Johns river, or at the mouth of the Madawaska river; no new barracks have in fact been built any where. In the third place, her Majesty's authorities are not concentrating a military force at the Grand Falls. The same trifling force of sixteen men is now stationed at the post of the Grand Falls, which has been stationed there for the last twelvemonth. It was perhaps, however, needless for the undersigned to advert to this last matter at all, as the post of the Grand Falls is beyond the bounds of the disputed territory, and within the acknowledged limits of New Brunswick.

The undersigned, while conveying the above information, upon a matter of fact, to the Secretary of State of the United States, takes occasion to repeat distinctly his former declaration, that there exists no intention on the part of Her Majesty's authorities to infringe the terms of those provisional agreements which were entered into at the beginning of last year, so long as there is reason to trust that the same will be faithfully adhered to by the the opposite party. But it is the duty of the undersigned, at the same time, clearly to state, that her Majesty's authorities in North America, taking into view the attitude assumed by the State of Maine, with reference to the boundary question, will, as at present advised, be governed entirely by circumstances in adopting such measures of defence and protection, (whether along the confines of the disputed territory, or within that portion of it where it has been before explained, the authority of Great Britain according to the existing agreements, was not to be interfered with,) as may seem to them necessary for guarding against, or for promptly repelling, the further acts of hostile aggression over the whole of the disputed territory, which it appears to be the avowed design of the State of Maine sooner or later to attempt.

For the undersigned has to observe, that not only is the extensive system of encroachment, which was denounced and remonstrated against by the undersigned in his official note of the 2d of last November, still carried on and persisted in by armed bands, employed by the authorities of Maine in the districts above the Aroostook and Fish rivers; but that acts, as above stated, of a character yet more violent and obnoxious to the rights of Great Britain, and more dangerous to the preservation of the general peace, are with certainty meditated by the inhabitants of that State. The existence of such designs has for months past been a matter of notoriety by public report; those designs were plainly indicated in the recent message of the Governor of Maine to the Legislature of the State; and they are avowed in more explicit terms in the letter addressed to the President of the United States by the Governor of Maine on the 21st of November, which letter has, within the last few days, been communicated to Congress, and published.

The undersigned, it is true, has been assured by the Secretary of State, in his note of the 16th inst. that the General Government see no reason to doubt the disposition of the Governor of Maine to adhere to the existing arrangements, and to avoid all acts tending to render more difficult and distant the final adjustment of the boundary question. But in face of the above clear indications of the intentions of Maine, as given out by the parties themselves, the Secretary of State has not given to the undersigned any adequate assurance that Maine will be constrained to desist from carrying those intentions into effect, if, contrary to the expectation of the General Government, the Legislature or the Executive of the State should think fit to make the attempt.

The undersigned not only preserves the hope, but he entertains the firm belief, that if the duty of negotiating the boundary question be left in the hands of the two National Governments, to whom alone of right it belongs, the difficulty of conducting the negotiation to an amicable issue will not be found so great as has been by many persons apprehended. But the case will become wholly altered, if the people of the State of Maine, who, though interested in the result, are not charged with the negotiation, shall attempt to interrupt it by violence.

Her Majesty's authorities in North America have, on their part, no desire or intention to interfere with the course of the pending negotiation, by an exertion of military force; but they will, as at present advised, consult their own discretion in adopting the measures of defence that may be rendered necessary by the threats of a violent interruption to the negotiation which have been used by all parties in Maine, and which the undersigned regrets to find confirmed by the language (as above referred to) employed by the highest official authority in that State.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State of the United States the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

(Signed) H. S. FOX.

The Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 28th Jan. 1840.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to reply, by direction of the President, to the note addressed to him on the 26th instant, by Mr. Fox, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain.

The President derives great satisfaction from the information conveyed by Mr. Fox's note, that with reference to the reported movements of British troops within the territory in dispute, no actual change has taken place in the attitude of her Majesty's authorities in the territory since the arrangements entered into by the two Governments at the commencement of last year for the preservation of tranquillity within its limits; and from his assurances that there exists no intention on the part of her Majesty's authorities to infringe the terms of those arrangements, so long as they are faithfully observed on the side of the United States. The President, however, cannot repress a feeling of regret that the British colonial authorities, without graver motives than the possibility of a departure from the arrangements referred to by the State of Maine, should take upon themselves the discretion, and, along with it, the fearful responsibility of probable consequences, of being guided by circumstances, liable as these are to be misapprehended and misjudged, in the adoption within the disputed territory of measures of defence and precaution, in manifest violation of the understanding between the two countries, whenever they may imagine that acts of hostile aggression over the disputed territory are meditated or threatened on the part of the State of Maine. The President cannot but hope that, when her Majesty's Government at home shall be apprised of the position assumed in this regard by its colonial agents, proper steps will taken to place the performance of express and solemn agreements upon a more secure basis than colonial discretion, to be exercised on apprehended disregard of such agreements on the part of the State of Maine.

It is gratifying to the President to perceive that Mr. Fox entertains the firm belief that the difficulty of conducting to an amicable issue the pending negotiation for the adjustment of the question of boundary is not so great as has, by many persons, been apprehended. As, under a corresponding conviction, the United States have, with a view to the final settlement of that exciting question, submitted a proposition for the consideration of her Majesty's Government, the President hopes that the sentiments expressed by Mr. Fox have their foundation in an expectation of his having it in his power at an early day to communicate to this Government a result of the deliberations had by that of her Britannic Majesty upon the proposition alluded to, which will present the prospect of a prompt and satisfactory settlement, and which, when known by the State of Maine, will put an end to all grounds of apprehensions of intentions or disposition on her part to adopt any measures calculated to embarrass the negotiation, or to involve a departure from the provisional arrangements. In the existence of those arrangements, the United States behold an earnest of the mutual desire of the two Governments to divest a question, abounding in causes of deep and growing excitement, of as much as possible of the asperity and hostile feeling it is calculated to engender; but unless attended with the most scrupulous observance of the spirit and letter of their provisions, it would prove but one more cause, added to the many already prevailing, of enmity and discord. Mr. Fox has already been made the channel of conveyance to his Government of the desire and determination of the President that the obligations of the country shall be faithfully discharged: that desire is prompted by a sense of expediency as well as of justice, and by an anxious wish to preserve the amicable relations now, so manifestly for the advantage of both, subsisting between the United States and Great Britain.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to renew to Mr. Fox assurances of his distinguished consideration.

(Signed) JOHN FORSYTH.

HENRY S. FOX, esq. &c. &c. &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that as an extra number of the document, to which this was a supplement, had been printed, he would move that five thousand extra copies be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of Seymour Treat, assignee of John Vanetten, a Canadian volunteer during the late war, praying to be allowed the pay and bounty land to which said Vanetten was entitled; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of William Ramsay, praying arrears of pay due him, and an allowance for certain expenses granted by the Department, and afterwards revoked; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of the widow of Jonas Snow, a soldier of the Revolution, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of a number of citizens of New Jersey, praying an appropriation for placing buoys in the south channel of Little Egg Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize the "Iron Mountain Company" to enter on a credit a quantity of land to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from the Iron mountain, in the State of Missouri, to the Mississippi river, and for other purposes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a bill for the relief of the administrator of Joseph Edson, reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred a bill for the more easy collection of small bank notes within the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for the last mentioned bill, a bill for the collection of bank notes of and under twenty dollars, issued by banks within the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of the association called the New England Mississippi Land Company; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the corporate authorities of the city of Mobile; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. WEBSTER, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether the law respecting vessels propelled by steam, does not require revision and amendment.

Mr. W. explained his reasons for submitting the motion, and suggested several points for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. GRUNDY said he was much gratified that the Senator from Massachusetts had moved in this matter. He thought this was a subject that required the exercise of the whole power we possessed over it; and he, for one, was for exercising that power. He would suggest, however, to the honorable Senator, the propriety of reducing the several points touched upon in his remarks as proper for the consideration of the committee, to writing, so that we might have an answer to each separate proposition; and the committee could report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would most cheerfully acquiesce in the Senator's suggestion; and the resolution was accordingly laid on the table until to-morrow.

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS.

The bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States was taken up on its third reading, read a third time, and passed.

THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. YOUNG said he was instructed by the Committee on Roads and Canals, to ask that the orders of the day might be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, (appropriating $150,000 in each of these States for that purpose,) with the object of making it a special order; which, after some remarks from Messrs. YOUNG, SMITH, of Indiana, TAPPAN and GRUNDY, in favor, and Messrs. CLAY, of Alabama, and HUBBARD, in opposition, was agreed to—ayes 25, noes 12.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. YOUNG, made the special order of the day for Wednesday, the 12th of February.

NAVY PENSIONS.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the bill to repeal certain acts respecting navy pensions, and making further provisions in relation to navy pensions was taken up.

Mr. WILLIAMS explained and advocated the provisions of the bill; when, on motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, it was postponed and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution; which, by unanimous consent, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy furnish the Senate with the names of all officers of the navy who were admitted to the roll of pensions between the 30th day of June, 1800, the day that the act of the 23d April, 1800, for the better government of the navy, went into operation, and the first day of January, 1837, designating those who were admitted for disabilities, occasioned by wounds received in battle, from those who were disabled from other causes; also, designating the nature and degree of disability in each case, and the battle in which such officer was wounded, or the occasion, or accident by which he was otherwise disabled; also, the rank of the officers aforesaid at the time disability occurred, and the nature of the service or particular station occupied by each individual at the time he may have been wounded, or otherwise injured in the line of his duty, together with the per month pension granted in each case.

The bill to transfer to the citizens of the parish of Concordia, in the State of Louisiana, the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land;

The bill to authorise the issuing of a patent to the heirs or legal representatives of Francis Rivard, deceased;

The bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana; and

The bill for the relief of Obed P. Lacey, were severally considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, January 29, 1840.

The question pending when the House adjourned on yesterday, was the point of order raised by Mr. JAMESON as to the right of Mr. GRAVES to offer the resolution below, the rules having been suspended for a specific purpose. The following is the resolution of Mr. GRAVES:

Resolved, That the whole subject of public printing, together with the communication lately received from Gales and Seaton on that subject, be referred to a select committe, to inquire into the best plan of executing the same, and to report by bill or otherwise; and that the printing which has been, or may hereafter be ordered, be executed in all things, except prices, in the manner prescribed by the joint resolution of Congress relating to that matter, approved March 3, 1819, and the Clerk of this House, under the supervision and control of the Committee of Accounts, is hereby authorized to make a contract or contracts, with some suitable person or persons, to execute said work, upon the best terms it can be done in the District of Columbia, provided the prices shall not exceed those fixed by the aforesaid joint resolution of 1819.

Mr. PARMENTER, by the permission of the gentleman entitled to the floor, asked leave to present to the House a petition from the Third Congressional district of Massachusetts, contesting the right of Mr. BAKER to hold a seat on this floor, and praying an investigation into the matter.

Objection being made to its reception,

Mr. PARMENTER said he would not, at that time, press a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer it.

Mr. CURTIS also made an attempt to present a petition, but it was also objected to.

Mr. JAMESON then reduced his point of order to writing, and was as follows:

"The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] moved the reconsideration of a vote given on yesterday upon a resolution requiring the Clerk to contract for the printing of the House upon the cheapest terms, for the purpose of introducing another proposition on that subject, which was read to the House; the motion to reconsider was carried; that being announced by the CHAIR, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] rose at the same time, and addressed the SPEAKER. The SPEAKER announced the gentleman from Kentucky as being entitled to the floor, and entertained a proposition from that gentleman, different to the one read by the gentleman from Indiana; upon which statement of facts the following point of order is raised, to wit: That the gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor for the purpose of introducing the proposition, which he announced to the honorable House he would introduce, if the motion to reconsider was adopted."

Mr. JAMESON said, in looking over the journal, he found that it had been the invariable practice of the House, when the rules had been suspended on the motion of a gentleman, for a specific object, the floor was always given by the Speaker to the gentleman who made the motion. Common courtesy, independent of justice and right, would entitle that gentleman to the floor. Should the opposite of the practice obtain, those who voted for a suspension of the rules for a specific proposition would be entrapped. He did not believe that that practice had ever been departed from, until yesterday; and if it should be carried out, it would, in his opinion, lead to very bad results; members would always be voting in the dark. The gentleman who made the proposition yesterday, [Mr. DAVIS of Indiana,] read to the House the proposition he intended to offer, and moved the reconsideration of a vote to enable him to submit it; but a combination had been formed to deprive that gentleman of the floor, after the vote had been reconsidered. Such combinations might be formed on every other question, and defeat the purpose of the suspension or reconsideration as it might be. On this occasion, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] all rose at the same time, but the gentleman from Kentucky got immediately in front of the gentleman from Indiana, and the SPEAKER awarded the floor to him, and his proposition being ruled out of order, Mr. WISE handed over his proposition to him. Thus it will be seen that adroit members, under the SPEAKER's decision, will have the best chance; and that if sustained, the SPEAKER can give the floor to those whose propositions he favors, and thus direct the legislation of Congress. These gentlemen, he said, had been the most fortunate this session in catching the SPEAKER's eye, and hence they have directed the legislation to a great extent. He called upon the young members whose rights might be abridged by those who were possessed of so much adroitness and tact in obtaining the floor to beware how they sustained this decision.

Mr. DUNCAN moved the previous question on the appeal, which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 104, nays 92.

So the decision of the SPEAKER was sustained.

Mr. GRAVES then addressed the House on his proposition, and in the course of his remarks he gave way to

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, to offer the following amendment:

"And into the expediency of entirely separating the patronage from the newspaper or public press of the country."

Mr. PARMENTER, in answer to some of Mr. GRAVES's remarks in reference to the price of the printing done for the Massachusetts Legislature, said that he had no doubt but the gentleman was correct as to the prices, but that it ought to be recollected that the amount of it was comparatively so small, that there were many large establishments in Boston who could perform it as incidental to their general business. Public printing could be done much lower in Boston than here, as well for the reason he had mentioned as from the circumstance that the composition was principally performed by females who worked for considerably less than what was paid here. He would add, that, in his experience in the Massachusetts Legislature, he had often known that body to be subject to much embarrassment and delay of business in consequence of their printing not being done in time.

Mr. DAVIS said that before he proceeded, he desired to know whether it was in order for him to offer an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES.]

The SPEAKER replied that it was not. The question was on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. DAVIS desired to know whether it was competent for the gentleman from Kentucky, the gentleman from Louisiana, and the SPEAKER, to decide what proposition is before the House, without its knowledge and consent.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, called Mr. D. to order; when

Mr. DAVIS disclaimed any intention of impugn-

ing the motives of the CHAIR. He asked for information, whether a gentleman who had the floor on a proposition he had submitted, could allow another to offer an amendment to it without its being stated to the House, and thus cut off all other amendments.

Mr. CRAIG made a few observations which were not distinctly heard—but he was understood to contend that the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana was not and could not be before the House—it having been offered while a gentleman was addressing the House, by his yielding the floor, and it not having been propounded by the CHAIR. He said that it was competent for the gentleman from Kentucky to receive the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana as a modification, and make it part of his proposition. It would then, being part of the original proposition, be subject to an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana contended that the gentleman from Kentucky had no right to yield the floor to the gentleman from Louisiana to offer an amendment, and then immediately go on with his remarks. The gentleman could not in this way offer an amendment, without the consent of the House, and the amendment was not propounded to the House by the Chair. If this decision was sustained, the House would perceive that any two gentlemen could combine together, and, in this way, cut off all amendments. It was known, Mr. D. said, that he was about to offer an amendment from the fact of his having moved the reconsideration; and this amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, if it was sustained by the Chair, precluded him from doing it.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky was, of itself, an amendment to an amendment; and therefore, it was not competent either for the gentleman from Louisiana or the gentleman from Indiana to move to amend it.

Mr. DAVIS apprehended that the gentleman from Massachusetts, with all his acknowledged knowledge of parliamentary law, was in an error. The House had adopted a certain rule, and no matter whether it had been amended or not, before its adoption, it stood on the record as a rule of the House. He had moved a reconsideration, and that motion prevailing, the whole rule and not the amendment came up for reconsideration.

Mr. WISE understood the facts to be these: There was a substantive proposition adopted in relation to the public printing. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] voted in the affirmative, and yesterday moved a reconsideration of the vote adopting it, which reconsideration prevailed. What, then, was the substantive proposition before the House? Why it was the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio that was adopted as an amendment. When, therefore, the gentleman from Kentucky introduced his proposition, he introduced it as an amendment to an amendment, and, therefore, neither the gentleman from Louisiana, nor the gentleman from Indiana could move to amend it.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said the matter struck him differently. It was a resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, in which was incorporated an amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] that was adopted; and the motion of the gentleman from Indiana was a proposition to reconsider that resolution as a whole, and not a part of it. It was clear that this was the understanding of both the gentlemen from Kentucky and Louisiana.

Mr. DAVIS. In order to set that matter right, I ask if it be in order to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER said it was not. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] had precedence.

Mr. VANDERPOEL appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON said he objected to the gentleman's making a point of order without reducing it to writing.

Mr. VANDERPOEL. It is not a point of order, but an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR; and I ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he can find any authority in parliamentary law, or the rules of the House, for requiring a member to reduce an appeal to writing. Mr. V. then stated the grounds on which he took the appeal.

[Here several voices were heard saying it is too late now to appeal.]

Mr. VANDERPOEL said the objection was made the very first opportunity that occurred. He did not wish to interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky while he was speaking, though he knew it was out of order for him to yield the floor merely for the purpose of having an amendment offered, but he made the objection as soon as that gentleman had concluded. He contended that the objection was made in time, and that it was not in the power of one gentleman to bargain away the rights of others to his favorites. The abuses to which this practice would lead were obvious. One gentleman, in the midst of his speech, yields the floor to another, who requests him to do so; that member offers his amendment, makes a long speech, and, in his turn, yields the floor to the friend who had so kindly accommodated him. Thus, (said Mr. V.) by the bland courtesy of two gentlemen towards each other, they might control the business of the House. Now, he would put it to the common sense of the House whether this practice was to be tolerated? What were the rules of the House founded on, if not on reason and common sense? and he would ask if this dangerous practice was consistent with either? He denied the right of the gentleman from Kentucky to yield the floor to another, for the purpose of letting in an amendment. If the gentleman had yielded the floor, and accepted the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana as a modification, and he begged the House to mark the distinction, it would have been in order, and consistent with the usual custom of the House; for a proposition accepted as a modification, becomes part of the primitive proposition, and is susceptible of amendment; but an amendment let in in this irregular way, without the consent of the House, cut off all amendments that others might wish to offer.

Mr. R. GARLAND contended that it was perfectly in order for him to move the amendment by the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky who was entitled to the floor. He denied that the gentleman from Indiana had a right to complain as if he had not offered the amendment, any other gentleman might have risen and obtained the floor before him, and thus cut off his amendment. If gentlemen did not like his amendment, all they had to do was to vote it down.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, was not surprised that a young member like the member from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] should have objected to the decision of the CHAIR, but he confessed that he was much astonished that an old member, of the intelligence of the gentleman from New York, and who was one of the leaders of his party, should risk his high reputation by such an absurdity as taking an appeal from it. What was the gentleman's proposition? Not that the amendment was not in order, but that it was moved by a sort of concert between the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Louisiana. The gentleman complained of the arrangement. Why, did not the gentleman know that no such an arrangement was binding on the House, and that when a gentleman yielded the floor, for the purpose of offering an amendment, any gentleman who could get up before him had the right to claim it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, observed that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] expressed himself as perfectly astounded that an old member of the intelligence and standing of the gentleman from New York, should be willing to risk his reputation by committing such an absurdity as appealing from the decision of the Chair, which was under consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, rose to explain. He was surprised that a gentleman of the intelligence of the gentleman from New York, should have taken the appeal, but he would not have been surprised if the gentleman from Maine had done it.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, continued. The gentleman from South Carolina, he said, had not added to the point of his remarks, and his attempt at wit was perfectly lost on him, (Mr. S.) The gentleman would not have been surprised had the appeal been made by a young member like the gentleman from Indiana, but was surprised and astounded that it should have been made by a gentleman of the experience and intelligence of the gentleman from New York. Now (said Mr. S.) this young member from Indiana is an older member, on this floor, than the chivalrous gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. THOMPSON here called the gentleman from Maine to order.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine. The gentleman will put his point of order in writing.

Mr THOMPSON then reduced his point of order to writing, as follows:

"The member from South Carolina calls the member from Maine to order, because no member has a right to allude to another by name, or to speak of him otherwise than as the honorable gentleman. The member from South Carolina objects to the term 'chivalrous' being applied to him, and especially by the gentleman from Maine."

The SPEAKER said that the point raised by the gentleman from South Carolina was no point of order, and that the gentleman from Maine, therefore, was not out of order.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, asked that the point of order made by the gentleman might be read; and it was then read accordingly.

Mr. S. continued. He did not expect, he said, so high a compliment from the gentleman as that he should have objected to his calling him the chivalrous gentleman. Now would not the gentleman have objected to his applying to him the term "unchivalrous?" If he had done so, he did not know what might have been the consequence. The gentleman would perhaps have started up, armed with pistols, bowie knives, and other mortal weapons. If the gentleman objected to his alluding to him in so complimentary a manner, he hardly knew how he could please him; but if he would only tell him how to designate him in future, he would do so with pleasure.

If the gentleman was surprised, astounded, and astonished that the gentleman from New York should make this appeal, he confessed that he was surprised that the gentleman, whose knowledge of the rules of order was not inferior to that of any one in the House, should be so perfectly obtuse in his understanding, as not to see that this decision of the CHAIR was made in violation of the established laws of parliamentary bodies, and would establish a dangerous and inconvenient precedent. Did he not see that, if sustained, it would be in the power of any two gentlemen to submit a proposition, and to shape, and mould it, so as to suit their purposes, in opposition to the will of the House? If the gentleman from South Carolina was so astonished at the appeal taken by the gentleman from New York, he would be equally so when the votes of two members reversed the decision. Were all those who opposed this decision, so very stupid as to be entitled to the contempt of the gentleman? No, sir: it appears to me that this decision is a violation of all the rules, as well of common sense as of parliamentary bodies. To permit a practice of this kind, would be to permit any two gentlemen to manage the legislation of the House as they pleased. He did not believe it was right for one gentleman to transfer his right to the floor to another, as was too often done. Mr. S. said he had a word to say on the main question, which he hoped he would have an opportunity of submitting to the House.

Mr. WISE rose to put an end to this debate, and to appeal to honorable gentlemen on all sides in behalf of the SPEAKER. He had witnessed (he said) more vexatious points of order and appeals in this session, than he had ever known in the course of the seven years he had been in that House. He did think, when they elected a Speaker at the beginning of the session, after much difficulty, and in a manner in which both parties had united, that the members would have sustained him in preserving the order and business of the House. He hoped, therefore, gentlemen on all sides would sustain the SPEAKER, and show their disapprobation of these continual appeals and points of order. Mr. W. concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. BANKS asked his colleague [Mr. WISE] to withdraw his motion, in order to enable him to explain his reasons for voting to sustain the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. WISE declined. He had already been applied to by other gentlemen, and had been compelled, from a sense of duty, to refuse.

The previous question having been seconded by the House, and the preliminary question having been carried,

The main question was taken, and resulted in sustaining the decision of the CHAIR—yeas 126, nays 71.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, January 30, 1840.

Mr. PHELPS presented resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial from citizens of Boston, praying for the allowance of drawback on foreign coal consumed in steampackets: which was laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of St. Josephs, Florida, praying for a division of the collection district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of citizens of Apalachicola, praying for the erection of a light-house at Cape San Blas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented a petition of citizens of that State for a change of mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr C. also presented the memorial of William Morrow, praying remuneration for the violation of a contract; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of citizens of Maine, praying for a reduction in the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying for the improvement of the navigation of Bayou Barth lomew; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of John Child, Daniel L. Miller, and other citizens of Philadelphia.

The motion to receive was,

On motion of Mr. KING, laid on the table.

Mr. S. also presented the petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, on the subject of the transfer of American vessels to foreigners, and praying for the adoption of measures to suppress the slave trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of the sureties of Archibald H. Sneed; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petion of Robert Grignon, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred

The petition of Louis M. Rivard;

The petition of Mary Blakesle and Unis Starr;

The petition of Eliza Delacour; and made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

The petition of Betsey Booth;

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Tracy, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Select Committee, to which was referred the resolution submitted some time since by Mr. BENTON, in opposition to the assumption of the debts of the States by the General Government, said he was directed to make a report thereon. It would be proper for him to say the committee were divided on the adoption of the report, five being in favor of it, and two—the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SMITH]—being opposed to it.

The report was then read. It argued at length, and with great ability, the unconstitutionality and inexpediency of the assumption of State debts by the General Government, and concluded with resolutions of the same tenor.

After a debate in which Messrs. GRUNDY, BENTON, and BROWN advocated and sustained the doctrines of the report, and Messrs. CRITTENDEN, WEBSTER, SOUTHARD, and PRESTON, opposed them,

On motion of Mr. KING,

It was recommitted to the select committee,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, January 30, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES,] on the subject of the public printing.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana rose, and said it was well known to the House, that all his acts, since he had the honor of a seat here, had been of that character that would conduce most to the expediting of the public business; and therefore, though he had intended to have replied, and, in justice to himself, should have replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, yet he would forego this sense of duty, and make another effort to bring about a vote of the House on the proposition he submitted the day before yesterday, and for which he moved the reconsideration. He should, on this occasion, make an effort to lay the proposition now before the House on the table, with a view to present the resolution which he proposed one or two days before; and, in order that he might understand his own position, he would ask of the CHAIR if it would be in order for him to move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] on the table, without taking with it the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAVES.]

The SPEAKER replied that a vote to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana on the table, would necessarily carry with it the other amendment and the resolution itself.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, in order that we may get as soon as possible to the transaction of the business of the country, which, I am admonished on all hands, that we ought to do, I will forego the duty which seems to devolve on me of justifying myself by a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, and submit a proposition which will enable us to proceed to that business in a constitutional form, acting under the existing laws which prescribed the manner in which the public printing shall be done, and acting also under the resolution that was adopted some days since, that we should go into the election of a public printer. Mr. D. then said he would move to lay the amendments on the table, for the purpose of taking up the proposition which he would now submit.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman could not move to lay one proposition on the table, and designate the one that was to be taken up.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I will take another course. I will move to lay the propositions now before the House on the table, with a view of offering the proposition that I now send to the CHAIR as a substitute, and I hope gentlemen will all vote with a full understanding of the proposition that is to be offered.

Mr. BLACK, with the permission of the gentleman who was entitled to the floor, said he would send to the CHAIR a proposition which he intended to offer in case the motion of the gentleman to lay the amendments on the table should prevail. Mr. B. then sent his proposition to the CHAIR, and desired that it might be read for the information of the House.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana requested that his proposition might be read, and the CLERK read it as follows:

Resolved, That this House will now proceed to the election of a public Printer, who shall proceed to execute the printing of this House agreeably to the requirements and compensation of existing laws, until such laws are modified by the legislation of Congress; and in the mean time, a committee of seven members shall be appointed by the CHAIR, who shall, within twenty-one legislative days from the date of their appointment, report to this House what amendments, if any, are necessary to the more prompt, perfect, and economical execution of the printing of Congress; whether the same should be let out to contract, or whether it would be more expedient to execute the same by a Congressional Printing House, press and type belonging to Congress, and subject to its superintendence.

Mr. BLACK'S resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved, That the House proceed instanter to the election of a Printer, and that as soon as the election shall have taken place, a committee of five members be elected viva voce by the House, to consider and investigate the subject of the public printing, and report to this House within ten days after their election, what price ought to be paid as a just and reasonable compensation to the Printer elect, for services by him to be performed, having due regard in their estimate to the quantity, quality, and due execution of the work.

Resolved, further, That the Printer shall be elected with the express understanding that he is to well and truly do and execute all the printing ordered from and after his election upon the terms, in the manner, and at the rates and prices which shall be prescribed by this House, upon the reception of the report of the said Committee of Investigation; and that said committee be instructed to inquire and report upon the propriety and expediency of entirely separating the patronage of the Government from the newspaper or public press of the country; and that said report, when made, shall be the special order of the day, and have precedence over all other business until the subject shall be finally disposed of.

Mr. BLACK then said, I give notice that I shall, at a proper time, move the adoption of the resolution which has been just read.

Mr. moved a call of the House; which motion was carried by yeas 170, nays 14.

The roll was then called over, when it appeared that 218 members answered to their names; and after calling the absentees and excusing some of the members who were absent from indisposition, several others attended.

Mr. BLACK moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. GRAVES called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which having been ordered, the question resulted in yeas 120, nays 87.

Mr. BLACK then inquired if the motion to lay the amendments on the table prevailed, whether it would be in order to submit any other proposition in relation to the matter?

The SPEAKER said that another proposition would not be in order, if there should be any business having priority over it.

Mr. RAMSEY inquired whether, if the amendments were laid on the table, it would require a vote of two-thirds to go into the election of Printer.

Mr. WISE protested against the CHAIR'S answering these preliminary questions.

The SPEAKER said it certainly would not require a vote of two-thirds to proceed to the election of Printer.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, which was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler

Wagner, Warren, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Wise—108.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, then submitted his resolution.

Mr. BLACK asked the gentleman to give way, in order that he might offer his resolution as a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS asked the gentleman to read his resolution, in order that he might judge whether he would accept it or not; but he was interrupted by

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, who contended that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana was not in order, and that no gentleman could, at that period of the day, offer any resolution or proposition of any nature, to take precedence of the general orders.

Mr. RAMSEY called on the gentleman to reduce this point of order to writing, and the SPEAKER requiring it

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana reduced his point of order to writing, and it was read.

The SPEAKER then decided that the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] was not then in order, because there was business on the calendar having precedence over it, and that that business was the unexecuted order that the House would proceed to the election of a Printer.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana said he now moved that the House proceed to the election of a public Printer; and that on that motion he moved the previous question.

Great confusion and disorder prevailed, and amid repeated calls to order,

Mr. BRIGGS rose, and said he understood the SPEAKER to declare that the first business in order was the election of Printer. Now, to reach that order, was it not necessary that a motion should be made to proceed to the election? Mr. B. made some other remarks, which the Reporter was unable to hear; but concluded with asking the SPEAKER, in order that he might fully understand his decision, what was the business first in order before the House.

The SPEAKER said it was the unexecuted order for the election of Printer.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired if the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, for postponing the election, and referring the whole matter to a committee, together with the other resolutions that had been submitted on the subject, did not come up with it?

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I understand that the SPEAKER has decided that the first business in order is the election of Printer.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the CHAIR.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move that the House proceed to the election of Printer, and on that motion I call for the previous question. Mr. D. also said that he nominated BLAIR and RIVES for the office.

Mr. HOLLEMAN also nominated BLAIR and RIVES.

Mr. SMITH. I have already nominated BLAIR and RIVES some days ago, and that nomination stands.

Mr. GARLAND of La. appealed from the decision of the CHAIR, and addressed the House at some length in support of the appeal.

Mr. BANKS observed that he did not rise for the purpose of raising questions of order, or in any way retarding the business of the House. He had concurred with the SPEAKER in the decisions which he had given within the two last days, and from which appeals had been taken, and notwithstanding the array of parliamentary rules which the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND] had brought forward, he entirely concurred with him now. He thought he should be able to show that the decision of the SPEAKER was in strict conformity with parliamentary law, and that the rules quoted by the gentleman had no application in this case. This was not a resolution, such as are ordinarily offered for the consideration of the House, and within the contemplation of the rules the gentleman referred to; but it was a resolution for the purpose of carrying into effect a law of the land. It was a resolution, in fact, to complete the organization of the House, and absolutely necessary for a correct discharge of the public business.

It was, therefore, of the same importance on the calendar as a bill. Can you then (said Mr. B.) to set aside this resolution, violate the laws of the land? What stood the first in order in the calendar? It was a resolution adopted by the House that it would forthwith proceed to the election of a public Printer—and that order, instead of having been executed, was arrested by a postponement till the 10th of the present month. The order, therefore, was now before the House, the day to which it was postponed having expired. Suppose the House had postponed a bill until the 10th day of the month, and that day had passed by, would it not then come up in its regular order on the calendar, and take precedence in its turn? And was not this order for the election of a Printer on the calendar, in the same standing as if it were a bill? Surely I was, and the decision of the SPEAKER was in strict conformity with parliamentary law, and this election ought to have been gone into long ago. When that was done, it would be competent for the House to raise a committee for the purpose of examining into the prices paid for public printing, and to reduce them if found to be too high. In that matter he would go as far as him who went farthest; but the business now was that which was first on the calendar, and it could not be set aside by any point of order. We are bound, said Mr. B. to act on that order, to execute or rescind it as the House may determine, but it cannot be set aside. The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GARLAND,] had addressed the House twice on the subject of his appeal, and as he was not disposed to occupy the time of the House, he would call for the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. LOWELL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The two preliminary questions were then put, and carried, after which

The main question was put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 64.

So the House sustained the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, here withdrew his motion for the previous question, at the request of Mr. BLACK, who asked if it was in order to amend the the resolution under which the House was now acting. He was unwilling he said to go into the election of Printer, without showing to the world the grounds on which he acted.

The CHAIR was of opinion that the resolution could not be amended, but that the gentleman could move to postpone it.

Mr. BLACK said he did not wish to interfere with the order of doing business in the House, but he would submit to gentlemen on all sides of the House whether it would not be better, before they went into the election of Printer, to adopt the resolution he had submitted. He hoped they would agree, by universal consent, to accept his proposition, in order that they might throw around the person or persons they should elect those restrictions, which were necessary for the protection of the public interests. If gentlemen on either side of the House wished to carry out their professions of economy and watchful regard of the public interests, now was the time for them to come forward.

Mr. WISE wished to state to the gentleman from Georgia one objection he had to his resolution, which, if removed, he would give his consent to its introduction. He had made a resolution never, as long as he lived, to vote for any man as Printer of the House, who was editor of a political paper. To separate the public printing from the political press, was a reform which the country loudly called for; and as no party could expect long to retain the ascendency, it would be for the interest of both parties to seize this favorable opportunity for making the separation. The resolution, if adopted, might justify the gentleman in voting for BLAIR and RIVES, or it might promote the election of GALES and SEATON. For his part, he would vote for neither; and he hoped the House would direct the CLERK to put out its printing to the lowest bidder, until they could get a report of a committee, and until they could adopt this great reform that he had suggested.

Mr. BLACK said he understood the gentleman from Virginia as objecting to the reception of his resolution; and if it could not be received by general consent, he should not consider it necessary for him to press it at this time, and he would therefore withdraw it.

Mr. STANLY then moved to postpone the further execution of the order until the 10th day of February next, for the purpose of offering another proposition, and addressed the House for a short time in support of his motion; when

Mr. CRARY rose to the following point of order, which, at the request of the CHAIR, he reduced to writing:

"That the question before the House not being debatable, a nomination for the election of Printer having been made, the motion to postpone, of the member from North Carolina, is not in order."

After a few remarks from Mr. TILLINGHAST,

The CHAIR decided that the motion for postponement was in order.

Mr. CRAIG said he would appeal from that decision; and in support of that appeal, argued that the House, having determined forthwith to proceed to the election of Printer, no other motion could be entertained. Without looking to parliamentary law as to the propriety of admitting the motion for postponement, common sense itself, he thought, would dictate the inadmissibility of it. The House having determined forthwith to do a certain thing, a motion to postpone would present in itself a perfect absurdity. There was but one single individual who objected to the execution of the order, and he put it to the House whether it would give it into the power of that individual to defeat its legislation. Mr. C. after a few more remarks, moved the previous question on the appeal.

The call for the previous question having been seconded by the House, and the preliminary question, "Shall the main question be now put?" having been put and carried,

Mr. DUNCAN inquired if, when the resolution for the election of Printer was up, it was not so far executed that a nomination was made.

The SPEAKER said that there was a nomination.

Mr. HOLLEMAN would inquire of the CHAIR if the House had not proceeded so far in the execution of the order for the election of Printer, that there was a nomination made, and whether it was not arrested by the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, while in the progress of execution.

The SPEAKER replied that he had already answered that there was a nomination.

The question was then taken on the appeal, and it resulted in sustaining the decision of the CHAIR—yeas 126, nays 89.

Mr. STANLY then resumed the floor, and, in continuation of his argument, read an article from the Democratic Review, highly complimentary of Mr. GARLAND, the Clerk of the House, which he endeavored, by ironical comments, to turn into ridicule. While in the progress of reading the article, however,

Mr. PETRIKIN and several others called the gentleman to order, for reading a matter foreign to the business before the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, hoped the gentleman might be permitted to proceed with the reading. Compliments, said he, so well deserved are very acceptable to us.

Mr. STANLY said that he should blush to receive a compliment from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. CRARY called the gentleman to order, and, being called upon to reduce his point of order to writing, presented it as follows:

"Mr. C. called Mr. STANLY to order for using the words 'he should blush to receive a compliment from the gentleman from Maine,' (addressing himself to Mr. SMITH.")

Mr. STANLY took his seat, observing that the gentleman need not have made his point of order, as he had concluded his remarks.

The point of order having been read,

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, said: I did not at the time hear the remark of the gentleman from North Carolina, but I beg the House to understand that nothing that that gentleman can say would make me blush.

The SPEAKER decided that Mr. STANLY's words were not in order, and that he could not proceed without leave of the House.

Mr. BANKS then obtained the floor, and after a few observations, moved the previous question on Mr. STANLY's motion to postpone the election.

Messrs. GARLAND of La. and UNDERWOOD, both rose and moved an adjournment.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the question having been taken, the motion to adjourn was decided in the negative—yeas 90, nays 112.

Mr. JENIFER then rose to a point of order, which he reduced to writing, as follows:

"Mr. STANLY was called to order by Mr. CRARY, for saying to Mr. SMITH, of Maine, 'I blush to receive a compliment from that gentleman.' Before Mr. CRARY reduced these words to writing, Mr. STANLY said he 'cheerfully retracted them, as he had misunderstood the gentleman from Maine.' The SPEAKER had decided these words to be out of order, and that Mr. STANLY must take his seat. Mr. STANLY did explain according to the 28th rule, before he was told by the SPEAKER to take his seat."

Mr. STANLY said that he had retracted the words he used in reference to Mr. SMITH, of Maine, while the gentleman from Michigan was writing his point of order, and before it was read from the CHAIR; and made every explanation that was necessary.

Mr. CRARY. I had the floor after calling the gentleman to order, until I could write out my point, and hand it to the CHAIR, and the gentleman was bound by the rules of the House to keep his seat in the mean time. It was not, therefore, in the power of the gentleman to make any explanation until the point was decided on by the CHAIR.

The SPEAKER said he understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that he would not ask the leave of the House to proceed, when he was called to order by the gentleman from Michigan, for he had concluded his remarks. On the point raised by the gentleman from Maryland, the CHAIR quoted the rule of the House applicable to the case, the substance of which is: that when a member is called to order, he must take his seat until the point of order is reduced to writing—when, if the CHAIR decides that he is out of order, he cannot proceed with his remarks, if one member objects, without leave of the House. In this case, the member from North Carolina was decided by the CHAIR to have been out of order, and no leave was given by the House or asked of it for him to proceed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, said that so far as he was concerned, he hoped the member from North Carolina might be permitted to proceed.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved a call of the House.

Mr. WISE made some remarks to show that the member from North Carolina ought to be permitted to proceed, and concluded by a motion to that effect.

The SPEAKER said it was not now in order, a call of the House having been ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. WILLIAMS's motion for a call of the House, and it was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, then moved an adjournment.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, the question was taken and rejected—yeas 89, nays 109.

The previous question on Mr. STANLY's motion to postpone, coming up, the call was seconded by the House, and the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 91, nays 107, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, S. H. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chittenden, J. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillett, Edwards, Evans, Everett, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Chas. Johnston, W. C. Johnson, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Tallaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, P. J. Wagner, Warren, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Wise—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Conner, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Davee, J. Davis, J. W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Gates, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Howard, Thomas B. Jackson, Jameson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, Mallory, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Sweeny, Taylor, P. F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Worthington—107.

Mr. BLACK here moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer his resolution; and after a few remarks, moved the previous question;

And the resolution having been again read,

After some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND, THOMPSON of Mississippi, CHAPMAN, WISE and BLACK,

The question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 158, nays 30.

So there being a vote of two-thirds, the rules were suspended, and

Mr. BLACK, after some remarks, again submitted his resolution, and moved the previous question on it; after which it was read.

Mr. WISE called for a division of the question, which was ordered; and the questions having been taken on the first and second branches successively, they were both carried.

Mr. CURTIS then moved an adjournment; but

Mr. SMITH of Maine calling for the yeas and nays,

Mr. CURTIS withdrew his motion.

The SPEAKER then said: The House will now proceed to the election of Printer.

Mr. WISE inquired if it would be in order for him to vote for the United States of America to be their own Printers; if not, he said he would go home and go to bed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL nominated BLAIR and RIVES.

Mr. FILLMORE asked if the election was to be by ballot or viva voce; and made some remarks to show that it ought to be by ballot.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that the election must be by ballot.

Mr. VANDERPOEL was really very much surprised at the point raised now. The rules of the House he considered imperative with regard to elections of its officers, and that they must be made viva voce. If the SPEAKER adhered to his decision, he should be obliged to appeal. He was here in 1836, when the same question was agitated, and when the matter was definitively settled by the House.

The SPEAKER was of opinion that the joint resolution, which prescribed the ballot system of election, could not be set aside by the rules of the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL begged the SPEAKER and the House to consider the dilemma into which this decision, if adhered to, would place them. If the CHAIR was right, the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLACK,] which they had just adopted was void, and all they had done under it was perfectly nugatory. If the CHAIR would take the pains to refer to the resolution of 1819, he would find, that so far as relates to the manner of electing, it was void. He would, however, take another course, and without taking an appeal, ask if it would be in order for him to move that the election should be viva voce.

The SPEAKER replied that that motion would be in order.

Mr. VANDERPOEL then moved that the House proceed to the election viva voce, and called for the previous question on his motion.

This motion having been carried,

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. VANDERPOEL, BLACK, SMITH, of Maine, and DAVIS, of Pennsylvania tellers; when

Mr. RAYNER said that, for the purpose of giving those who would vote for BLAIR and RIVES an opportunity to sleep and meditate upon the enormity of their intentions, he would move that the House do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays having been called for,

Mr. RAYNER withdrew his motion.

Mr. CURTIS renewed the motion, but also withdrew it.

The House then proceeded to the election viva voce, and the roll having been called through, Mr. VANDERPOEL, on the part of the tellers, reported that there were 207 votes given, of which 104 were necessary to a choice; and that

BLAIR and RIVES received - - -	110
GALES and SEATON - - - -	92
TH. W. WHITE - - - -	2
JACOB GIDEON - - - -	1
S. STAMBAUGH - - - -	1
DUFF GREEN - - - -	1

Vote as taken, was as follows:

FOR BLAIR AND RIVES.—Messrs. J. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, A. V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, M. A. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Th. Davee, John Davis, J. W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Howard, Jackson, Jameson, Jos. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, E. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, A. Smith, Tho. Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Sweeny, Taylor, F. Thomas, P. F. Thomas, Jac. Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, D. D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, Hen. Williams, Worthington, and Mallory—110.

FOR GALES AND SEATON.—Messrs. Adams, Alford, S. H. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chittenden, Jas. Cooper, Corwin, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, E. Davies, Gar. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dillet, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, R. Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Granger, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Chs. Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Kempshall, Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, P. J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Th. W. Williams, Lewis

Williams, Jos. L. Williams, and Sherrod Williams—92.

For Th. W. White.—Messrs. Wise, and Huner, Speaker.

For Jacob Gideon.—Mr. Jas. Garland—1.

For S. Stambaugh.—Mr. Hopkins—1.

For Duff Green.—Mr. Mitchel'—1.

The SPEAKER then announced that Blair and Rives were duly elected Printers of the House.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, of Maine,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

Friday, Jan. 31, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th inst. in relation to internal improvements in the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a representation from Jehiel Brooke, late Indian agent; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the petition of Williamson Smith, praying remuneration for expenses incurred and services performed by him, under a contract with a Government agent, for the removal of the Cherokee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, presented the petition of a number of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa. and of citizens of the State of Maine, for a Congress of Nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of the heirs of Joseph Thompson, deceased, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Select Committee, to which was recommitted the report submitted yesterday on the resolution offered some time since by Mr. Benton, in opposition to the assumption of the debts of the States by the General Government, reported it, with some modifications; which were read,

A discussion ensued, in which Messrs. GRUNDY, HUBBARD, and WRIGHT, sustained and advocated the report, and Messrs. PRESTON, SOUTHARD, and MERRICK opposed it; when it was informally passed over.

The Senate went into Executive business; and then Adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 31, 1840.

The first thing in order was the execution of the resolution of Mr. Black, to elect a committee of five, viva voce, to inquire into the propriety of reducing the present tariff of prices for executing the public printing, or of having the same done in a national office, to be established for that purpose.

The SPEAKER suggested that if the House would proceed to the election of the committee, and vote for one member at a time, it would soon ascertain the practicability of the plan. He thought it would take but a short time, should that mode be adopted.

Mr. GRAVES inquired, why not vote for all at the same time. He thought the resolution required it. Mr. G. then moved that there be a call of the House.

The CHAIR said the resolution required that the whole five should be voted for at the same time; and as objection had been made to the mode suggested, the House would proceed in accordance with the resolution.

Mr. HOFFMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the call; which were ordered, and were—yeas 140, nays 44.

So a call of the House was ordered, and was proceeded in until 208 members answered to their names; when

Mr. ADAMS said it was customary, when committees had leave to sit during the sittings of the House, to permit the members thereof to vote at any time; and on a call of the House, were always excused if absent. Mr. A. then moved that the members of committees who were absent, he notified that there was a call of the House; which motion was agreed to.

The names of the absentees having been called over,

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved that all further proceedings in the call be suspended; which was agreed to.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the House now proceed to elect the committee, by voting for one member at a time.

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 54, nays 132.

The SPEAKER then said that each gentleman, when his name was called, would vote for the five members to compose the committee. He then appointed Messrs. Briggs, Burke, Floyd, and James Garland, as tellers.

Mr. HOPKINS asked to be excused from voting, and gave his reasons therefor; but the House refused said request.

The House then proceeded to the vote, viva voce, and the roll was gone through with; but before the result was announced,

Mr. POPE moved that when the House adjourn, it would adjourn till Monday next.

Mr. BANKS said it was clearly out of order to submit such a motion in the then condition of the House, it being divided upon a vote.

The CHAIR (Mr. Lincoln) decided that it was in order.

Mr. PETRIKIN. Was there ever such a thing heard of? Was ever the like known—that the Chair had entertained such a motion when the House was divided upon a vote? I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIR said it had been done at the last session, under similar circumstances, when the House was in the act of electing a committee.

Mr. GRIFFIN called for the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded, and the main questioned was ordered—which main question was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question then recurred on the motion to adjourn till Monday next; and the yeas and nays having been ordered upon the same,

Mr. POPE withdrew his motion.

Mr. DAVEE renewed the motion; but the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it, he also withdrew it.

Mr. EVANS again renewed the motion.

Mr. LEWIS demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on said motion, by count, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 89, nays 44.

The House having determined that when it adjourns, it would adjourn till Monday next,

Mr. S. WILLIAMS moved that it now adjourn.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative; and

The House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE,

Monday, February 3, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements showing the contracts made in that Department during the year 1839, and the expenditures from the Marine Hospital Fund during the year 1838; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a message from the President of the United States, communicating a report from the Director of the Mint, showing the operations of that institution during the year 1839; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented several petitions of male and female citizens of Jefferson county, Indiana, against slavery in different forms.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the question of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of citizens of Adams county, and a memorial of citizens of York county, Pennsylvania, praying for the imposition of a moderate duty on imported silks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial which he was informed was signed by every firm connected with the silk business in Philadelphia, praying for the same object as the above; which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. B also presented a memorial of coach lace weavers of Newark, N. J. which stated that by the construction given to the law by the revenue officer, German silk lace was imported free of duty, and sold at prices cheaper than the domestic manufacturer could sell the common worsted lace, and praying for relief; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of Britton Evans, praying remuneration for property lost in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of inhabitants of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying for the construction of a steam revenue cutter in Delaware bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial of Thomas Cooper and twenty-four other citizens of Philadelphia;

And a memorial of William H. Ashford and seventy-six other citizens of Germantown, Philadelphia county, severally praying for an alteration in the laws which relate to the sale and transfer of American vessels while abroad; and for the abolition of the slave trade throughout the world; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of Thomas B. Longstreth and 74 other inhabitants of the county of Philadelphia; and

The petition of Jacob M. Ellis and 21 other citizens of Philadelphia county, praying for an alteration of the Constitution, so as to abolish slavery in the United States;

Also, the petition of David Paul Brown and 24 other legal voters of the city and county of Philadelphia;

The petition of Sarah T. Naylor and 27 other women of Philadelphia county; and

The petition of Elizabeth Drake and 63 other women of Bucks county; severally praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

The motion to receive the above was,

On motion of Mr. KING, laid on the table.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Abraham Williamson; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MOUTON presented the memorial of John Compton; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Louisville, complaining of the great burthen imposed by the tolls of the Louisville and Portland Canal on the commerce of the West, and praying that the Government would purchase the individual stock thereof.

In connection with this subject, he said he had received a letter from a very experienced pilot, who stated his impression that for the trifling sum of $150,000 the obstruction of the navigation now existing at the falls, might be removed, and the natural channel of the river made navigable, rendering unnecessary the purchase of the canal stock. He thought it would be a proper subject for the committee to inquire into the propriety of authorizing an appropriation for a survey of the falls, and the probable expense of clearing out the obstructions in the natural channel of the river. He asked that the memorial might be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, that in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, he would say that the committee had this subject under consideration. His individual opinion was that the improvement of the natural channel of the river was the most expedient and economical.

Mr. KING said he had no objection to the reference of this memorial proposed by the honorable Senator who presented it; but the practice heretofore had uniformly been, when memorials called for surveys, for the purpose of improving the navigation of rivers, to refer it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WHITE said that a suggestion had been thrown out, to which it might be necessary to call the attention of the Senate: that the Government, by becoming a joint stockholder with this company, has given an implied pledge that she will do nothing that will depreciate the value of their stock.

Mr. LINN said that he had in his possession a letter from a skilful and experienced pilot, who had been connected with the business for twenty-nine years, that these falls can be improved at a small expense. He thought that when an incorporated company sets up such a pretension as that alluded to by the Senator from Indiana, it was time that the monopoly was removed. He had been informed that, acting on the suggestions of persons connected with the navigation of the Ohio, a company was formed, who subscribed $2,000 to make experiments in blowing up the obstructions in the bed of the river; and from their success they were decidedly convinced of its practicability at a very moderate expense.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky expressed his most decided dissent to the position that, because the Government had became a stockholder in this company, they are thereby precluded from improving the natural channel of the river. He thought it a most monstrous pretension, without the slightest foundation in law or equity.

Mr. BENTON said the petition of the Louisville Chamber of Commerce referred itself to a question which was depending before the Senate, and which question presented itself under three different aspects; either to extinguish the rights of the private corporators in the Louisville canal, or to improve the falls of the Ohio, or to make a canal on the Indiana side. Some weeks ago, and on his motion, the Senate had adopted a resolution of inquiry in relation to all these points; and among those who had answered it, was the Chamber of Commerce of Louisville, which had done him (Mr. B.) the honor to send him a copy of their answer, which he had carefully read, and to which he was indebted for valuable information and suggestions. He (Mr. B.) wished to collect all information belonging to the subject, and then to act for the best. Of course care would be taken, in remedying one evil, not to inflict another; that is to say, not to injure the port of Louisville, and the navigation of the river above. The tolls were enormous, and deserved the character he had given of them some years ago; namely, fines or penalties inflicted upon the boats for passing through the canal. Besides the Chamber of Commerce of Louisville, he was also indebted to Mr. Hulme, the collector of the tolls, and to several pilots of the falls, and steamboat captains, for valuable information on the same points. Mr. Hulme sent him a full report of the operations of the canal for the last year, with a recapitulation of the number of boats which passed, and the amount of the tolls collected, since the opening of the canal in 1831. In that year, the amount collected was $12,750; in the last year, the amount was $180,496; and the aggregate for the nine years was $776,496. This was enormous; but the enormity was still more striking in looking at it in detail—at the toll paid by a few individual boats. This is shown in the report made by Mr. Hulme. Thus, a Cincinnati boat, of two hundred and fifty-two tons, in the New Orleans trade, paid last year $2,275 50. A small boat in the St. Louis trade, of only 86 tons, paid, in the same year, $1,238 40. This was a sample, and it showed the burthen on Western commerce to be intolerable. He (Mr. B.) did not know what measure he should ultimately support to relieve the commerce of the West from these burthens; it might be to extinguish the rights of the private corporators, and make the canal free, except for the small levy necessary to keep it in order and to attend it; or, it might be to improve the falls; or, it might be to open another canal on the right bank of the river; or it might be a combination of these different plans. He could not decide until he got a full view of the facts which may be given, and the opinions furnished, under the Senate's call, by informed and practical men. But he was determined to exert himself for the remedy of the great evil complained of, and that without doing wrong or injury to others. The rights of the private corporators must be duly considered; the port at Louisville, and the navigation of the river above, must all be duly considered. In the mean time, he would suggest that the amount held by the United States in the canal, say above $300,000; and the share of tolls which she has received, and is receiving, may constitute a fund to disembarrass the Western commerce of the burthens of this canal, without drawing a cent from the public Treasury. Whatever plan may be adopted, he looked to this source to supply the means.

Mr. KING said he recollected in years gone by, when Congress was earnestly importuned by gentlemen of the West, to interest the Government in this Louisville and Portland canal. It was then considered as a subject which would be of vast service to the commerce of the West. The charter of this company was then before us, and the high rate of tolls which, by that instrument, they were allowed to exact, was pointed out; but they were not then considered as "exorbitant," or as "fines and penalties" on the commerce of the West. But now we are appealed to, to buy up the individual stock at an enormous price to relieve the commerce of that, which at a former period, we were told would be of such geat service to it. And this was the general course of these connections. When such a proposition is made, if we do not assist with our means, the Government is denounced as illiberal, and opposed to the interests of the West; and when we consent, we are afterwards appealed to, to relieve them from the consequences of our compliance. He was not opposed to the reference, but gave notice, if this question was brought before the Senate, he was not prepared to exhaust the Treasury by purchasing the stock of this company.
